The Parol Evidence Rule and Implied Terms: The Sound of Silence

Helen Hadjiyannakis
Fordham University School of Law

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.lawnet.fordham.edu/flr

Part of the Law Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://ir.lawnet.fordham.edu/flr/vol54/iss1/10

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by FLASH: The Fordham Law Archive of Scholarship and History. It has been accepted for inclusion in Fordham Law Review by an authorized editor of FLASH: The Fordham Law Archive of Scholarship and History. For more information, please contact tmelnick@law.fordham.edu.
The Parol Evidence Rule and Implied Terms: The Sound of Silence

Cover Page Footnote
The author wishes to thank the Fordham law students who provided research assistance for this article: Michael Getzler, Owen Kalt, Steven Feinmen, Sara Culp and John Caulfield.
THE PAROL EVIDENCE RULE AND IMPLIED TERMS: THE SOUNDS OF SILENCE

HELEN HADJIYANNAKIS*

INTRODUCTION

When a client asks his lawyer what his duties are under a particular written contract, the lawyer's first words of response are usually: "Show me the contract." Yet a party's contractual obligations cannot be determined solely from a literal reading of a contractual document. The obvious first step is to interpret the document's language in light of all relevant circumstances, including any prior dealings between the parties and usages of the trade. Assuming that interpretation reveals no provision in the writing covering a particular issue, should the lawyer advise the client that he has no obligations other than those listed in the contract? Definitely not.

A seller of goods, for example, may have made no express warranties, yet be liable for breach of implied warranties arising from the circumstances of the sale. Furthermore, an obligation of good faith and fair dealing, which exists in all contracts, requires in some cases only absence of interference in the other party's performance, but in others, affirmative conduct to cooperate in enhancing the other party's profits.

* Associate Professor, Fordham University School of Law; B.A. 1969, Vassar College; J.D. 1978, Fordham University School of Law. The author wishes to thank the Fordham law students who provided research assistance for this Article: Michael Getzler, Owen Kalt, Steven Feinman, Sara Culp and John Caulfield.

1. See infra note 184.

3. See, e.g., Concrete Specialties v. H.C. Smith Constr. Co., 423 F.2d 670, 672 (10th Cir. 1970) (duty of cooperation); Ligon v. Parr, 471 S.W.2d 1, 3 (Ky. 1971) (same); Mortgage Corp. v. Manhattan Sav. Bank, 71 N.J. Super. 489, 502, 177 A.2d 326, 334 (1962) ("Though a court balks at making a contract for the parties, it will, where justice and expediency demand, infuse the contract with a spirit of good faith and fair dealing in order to justify the implication of a covenant which will prevent one party from impairing the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract.") (quoting Price v. Spielman Motor Sales Co., 261 App. Div. 626, 629, 26 N.Y.S. 2d 836, 839 (1941)) (quoting 25 Cornell L.Q. 615, 615-16 (1940)).
under the contract. Assuming that the parties intend a contract, terms absent from the agreement of the parties but necessary for the resolution of the parties' contractual rights and obligations may be supplied by the court. The purpose of this Article is to explore the relationship between the implication of terms, sometimes called "the process of implication," and the parol evidence rule. Although each topic has been the subject of considerable scholarly examination, the relationship between the two has received scant attention.

The parol evidence rule states that if the parties assent to a writing as the final and complete expression of the terms of their agreement, evidence of prior or contemporaneous agreements may not be admitted to contradict, vary, or add to the terms of the writing. Although the

---

5. A phenomenon recognized by the sales article of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC or Code) is that generally parties consciously bargain over only a few important terms of a contract for the sale of goods: quantity, description and price. Hawkland, Sales Contract Terms under the U.C.C., 17 U.C.C. L.J. 195, 196 (1985).

8. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 562, at 286.

10. Some aspects of the issue have been addressed by Professor Farnsworth in Farnsworth, supra note 6, at 887-90 and by the Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 204 comment e & ill. 1.

11. For various formulations of the parol evidence rule, see U.C.C. § 2-202 (1978); 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 573, at 357; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 631, at 948-51.

The statement in the text referring to contemporaneous agreements requires some explanation and qualification. A contemporaneous written agreement is generally deemed part of the final writing and is therefore operative. See Brown v. Financial Serv. Corp., 489 F.2d 144, 149 (5th Cir. 1974); Restatement of Contracts § 237 comment a (1932).
courts traditionally assumed such assent from the mere fact that an apparently complete writing was entered into, \(^{12}\) the Uniform Commercial Code and the Second Restatement of Contracts (Second Restatement) no longer make that assumption. \(^{13}\) The increased willingness of courts to supply terms to fill gaps in parties’ agreements and the liberalization of the parol evidence rule mean that one who enters into an apparently complete written contract has no assurance that his only obligations are those expressed in the writing. A court might “imply” a term, or permit the other party to prove a term agreed to during negotiations but not included in the final written agreement. This Article explores the dynamic between the two possibilities.

Part I of this Article considers whether a rule of law that applies to the agreement as written is protected by the parol evidence rule. This issue arises when a party seeks to introduce proof of an oral agreement displacing a rule of law that would apply to the agreement as written. Parts II through V pose the opposite question: Does the parol evidence rule exclude a term implied by law? Whereas the issue addressed in Part I assumes that the court has already decided that a legal obligation exists, Parts II through V do not. Part II considers whether the parol evidence rule applies to obligations imposed by law. In other words, does the fact that the parties have entered into a written agreement affect the court’s ability (or willingness) to supply a term? Parts III through V consider whether the parol evidence rule bars proof of the negotiations of the par-

\(^{12}\) See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 628, at 913-14. As to contemporaneous oral agreements the prevailing view is that their proof is subject to exclusion by the parol evidence rule. See U.C.C. § 2-202 (1978); First Restatement, supra, § 237; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 637, at 1036. Corbin disagrees presumably because the substantive basis of the parol evidence rule, intention to supersede and discharge a prior agreement, is inapplicable to simultaneous agreements. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 577, at 400-01. His reasoning appears to be as follows: If “contemporaneous” means “simultaneous,” two results follow. First, the existence of a consistent oral agreement is relevant to show the writing is incomplete. \textit{Id.} at 401. If the oral agreement exists, the writing must necessarily be incomplete because “[o]ne cannot express simultaneous assent to two things and at the same instant agree that one of them supplants and nullifies the other.” \textit{Id.} Second, by the same reasoning, the existence of a contradictory oral agreement is relevant to show that a writing was not assented to as final. \textit{See id.} § 583, at 469-70, § 573, at 203-04 n.1 (1971 Supp.). If “contemporaneous” does not mean “simultaneous,” the oral agreement is either prior or subsequent to the writing. \textit{See id.} § 577, at 401. The parol evidence rule does not apply to subsequent agreements. \textit{Id.}; J. Calamari & J. Perillo, The Law of Contracts § 3-6, at 113-14 (2d ed. 1977).

The Second Restatement position appears to be that the parol evidence rule does apply to contemporaneous agreements. \textit{See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 215 (evidentiary effect is to exclude “evidence of prior or contemporaneous” agreements). But see id. § 213(1), (2) (substantive effect is to discharge only prior agreements). The Reporter declined to follow Corbin’s view because terms can be “relatively contemporaneous.” \textit{See} 48 A.L.I. Proc. 441, 449 (1971) (remarks of Professor Braucher) [hereinafter cited as 1971 ALI Proceedings].

\(^{13}\) See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 633, at 1014-15. \textit{See infra} note 46 and accompanying text.

\(^{14}\) See \textit{infra} notes 78-79, 93, 95 and accompanying text.
ties to establish a legal obligation (Part III), to give definition to a legal obligation (Part IV) or to negate a legal obligation (Part V).

The inquiry into the relationship between the parol evidence rule and implied terms is complicated by the lack of uniformity of scholarly and judicial opinion as to the scope of the rule.\(^4\) This lack of uniformity in turn reflects divergent opinions on the theoretical bases of the rule.\(^4\) Although most authorities agree that the parol evidence rule is not a rule of evidence,\(^6\) there is no agreement as to whether it is a rule of substantive law based on the intention of the parties,\(^7\) a rule of form which operates to limit freedom of contract,\(^8\) a rule of estoppel,\(^9\) a rule of procedure\(^20\) or a rule of judicial convenience.\(^21\)

A second complication arises because this inquiry requires careful identification of the basis on which the particular obligation is implied. An obligation may be implied as an inference of the intention of the parties, i.e., implied in fact, or as a duty imposed by law to fill a gap in the parties' agreement, i.e., implied in law.\(^22\) The courts, though, are seldom

---

16. See Rinaudo v. Bloom, 209 Md. 1, 5-6, 120 A.2d 184, 187-88 (1956); 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 573, at 357-58; First Restatement, supra note 11, § 237 comment a; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 213 comment a; 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2400, at 4; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 631, at 955. Wigmore has stated of the parol evidence rule:

It does not exclude certain data because they are for one or another reason untrustworthy or undesirable means of evidencing some fact to be proved . . . . What the rule does is to declare that certain kinds of fact are legally ineffective in the substantive law; and this of course (like any other ruling of substantive law) results in forbidding the fact to be proved at all.

9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2400, at 4.
17. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 573, at 357, § 582, at 448.
22. See Farnsworth, supra note 6, at 865.

Implied terms have been divided into three categories: (1) terms that the parties intended, (2) terms that the parties would have intended had they thought about it and (3) terms that are fair. The first involves a search for the parties' intention, the second involves a search for the parties' hypothetical intention, the third has nothing to do with the parties' intention, except that the court will generally not imply a term in the face of the parties' expressed intent to the contrary. See Williams, Language and the Law—IV, 61 L.Q. Rev. 384, 401 (1945). "Implied in law" or "constructive" terms, see infra note 25, include the second and third categories. See Farnsworth, supra note 6, at 865.

A variation of the first category avoids the inquiry into the actual intention of the parties by relying on an objective approach: Would a reasonable person in the position of the other party be justified in concluding that such a promise was made? See Stop & Shop, Inc. v. Ganem, 347 Mass. 697, 701, 200 N.E.2d 248, 251 (1964); Havel v. Kelsey-clear as to whether “implied” terms are imposed by law or implied in fact. The distinction, however, may have certain consequences on the operation of the parol evidence rule. This Article will generally adopt the Second Restatement approach that “implied” terms are usually imposed by law, but will also consider the consequences of treating those terms as implications of fact.

I. ARE RULES OF LAW PROTECTED BY THE PAROL EVIDENCE RULE?

The parol evidence rule proceeds from the premise that if the parties to a contract so intend, they can fully integrate their agreement. Hayes Co., 83 A.D.2d 380, 382, 445 N.Y.S.2d 333, 335 (1981); 11 S. Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 1295, at 37 (3d ed. 1968).

If the term is implied in fact, but not from the writing alone, it is part of the parties' agreement not reduced to writing. Thus, it could conceivably be subject to the parol evidence rule. See supra text accompanying note 11. This result is often avoided by a process of interpretation. See infra note 179 and accompanying text. If the term is “implied in law,” it is an obligation imposed by law on the parties' agreement and is not subject to the parol evidence rule. See infra note 156 and accompanying text.

The term “integration” is Wigmore's. See 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2425, at 75-76. In connection with this definition, Corbin stated:

Wigmore, whose experience was immense and whose opinion is worth as much as another's, thought it advisable to adopt the unfamiliar word “integration” in place of “writing” or “written contract” and to give it his own definition so that his own meaning in his discussion of the law might be accurately apprehended by his readers. It is not certain how well he succeeded in this; and in adopting the new term it is quite possible that new confusion was caused and that it has been used according to the system of Humpty Dumpty rather than with the meaning of Wigmore. It certainly has not yet simplified the application of the parol evidence rule or eliminated the previously prevailing variations and inconsistencies.

3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 588, at 528. “Integration” is used by both Corbin, see id. § 573, at 357, and Williston, supra note 9, § 531, at 949, as well as by both Restatements, see First Restatement, supra note 11, § 228; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 209, and numerous judicial opinions, see, e.g., Farmer v. Arabian Am. Oil Co., 277 F.2d 46, 49 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 824 (1960); Chism v. Omlie, 239 Miss. 576, 582, 124 So. 2d 286, 289 (1960); Black v. Evergreen Land Developers, Inc., 75 Wash. 2d 249, 257, 450 P.2d 470, 475 (1969).

The First Restatement and other authorities have used the term “integrated” to mean “fully integrated.” See, e.g., Masterson v. Sine, 68 Cal. 2d 222, 225, 436 P.2d 51, 563.
senting to a writing as the final and complete expression of their agreement. All agreements reached during negotiations but not included in the final and complete writing are superseded. It is also possible for the parties to integrate their agreement partially by assenting to the writing as the final expression of only those terms contained in the writing. In the latter case, inconsistent agreements of the parties are superseded but consistent additional terms may be proved. When the parties decide to express their agreement in a final writing, are the rules of law that apply to their agreement as written deemed integrated as well? That is, does the court read the written contract as though applicable rules of law are a part of it?

A. "Implied in Law" Terms

Consider a written contract for the repair of a structure. The writing states no completion date. The owner seeks to introduce evidence of an oral agreement made prior to the execution of the written contract that the repairs would be completed within three months. If the parties had not agreed on a completion date the law would imply an obligation to complete within a reasonable time. May the parties' actual agreement be proved? Because the writing is silent on time for performance, the fixed completion date is a consistent additional term, operative if the 65 Cal. Rptr. 545, 547 (1968) (en banc); First Restatement, supra note 11, § 228; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 636, at 1033. This use is misleading because an agreement may be unintegrated, partially integrated or fully integrated. E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.3, at 452. The Second Restatement carefully distinguishes an integrated agreement (one expressed in a final writing) from a fully integrated agreement (one expressed in a final and complete writing). See Second Restatement, supra note 2 §§ 209-10. The UCC makes a similar distinction, but without using the words "integrated" or "integration." See U.C.C. § 2-202 (1978) (initial paragraph refers to "final expression"; subsection (b) refers to "complete and exclusive statement"). This Article maintains the distinction between an integrated agreement and a fully integrated agreement.

---

27. See J. Calamari & J. Perillo, supra note 11, § 3-2, at 99; 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 573, at 368-69, § 582, at 447-48; First Restatement, supra note 11, § 237; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 213; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 631, at 952-53.

28. See J. Calamari & J. Perillo, supra note 11, § 3-2, at 101. Corbin agrees but advocates abandoning the term "partial integration," because "it... seem[s] unlikely that the parties intended the partial writing to be conclusive as to anything." 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 581, at 441.

29. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 636, at 1035 ("[I]f a contract is even partially reduced to writing, the written portion is no more subject to contradiction by parol than the entire contract would be had it been wholly reduced to writing.").

30. Id. § 636, at 1033.

agreement is partially integrated, superseded if the agreement is fully integrated. If, however, the "reasonable time" rule is deemed to be integrated, the written contract is read as though it stated in writing: "The repairs will be completed within a reasonable time." Proof of the agreed fixed completion date is, therefore, automatically excluded because it contradicts "reasonable time." The court need never reach the difficult question of whether the agreement is fully or partially integrated.

The law governs the parties' agreement; it does not write the agreement. The scope of contractual obligation comprises two components: the parties' agreement and the rules of law or obligations a court imposes to fill gaps in the agreement. To the extent that the rules of law are not

---

3.3 Presumably, the offered term will always be, to some extent, inconsistent with the implied term. Otherwise its introduction into evidence would be superfluous.

34. See U.C.C. § 1-201(3), (11) (1978); see also 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 541, at 95-96 n.69 (discussing the obligation of good faith and fair dealing and citing Lord Wright's remarks that courts are in a sense making a contract for the parties by compelling payment of a reasonable price); E. Durkheim, The Division of Labor in Society 214 (1964) (Contract law "forces us to assume obligations that we have not contracted for, in the exact sense of the word, since we have not deliberated upon them"). But see S. Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 3A, at 14 (3d ed. 1957) ("Accuracy of reasoning requires a recognition of such obligations . . . as quasi contracts"); Speidel, The New Spirit of Contract, 2 J. L. & Comm. 193, 208 (1982) ("[A] duty of good faith in performance and enforcement of a contract imposed without the parties' consent . . . is a form of tort.").

Within the context of a contract, so-called "implied in law" obligations should properly be called contractual obligations though not strictly based on intention. Any reference to intent merely means absence of intent to the contrary. These obligations are governed by contract remedies. See Seaman's Direct Buying Serv. v. Standard Oil Co., 36 Cal. 3d 752, 768, 686 P.2d 1158, 1166, 206 Cal. Rptr. 354, 362 (1984) (contract remedies for breach of implied covenant of good faith have included specific performance, rescission and damages). Of course, the breach of an implied covenant may also create tort liability. See id., 686 P.2d at 1166, 206 Cal. Rptr. at 362; Diamond, The Tort of Bad Faith Breach of Contract: When, If at All, Should It Be Extended beyond Insurance Transactions?, 64 Marq. L. Rev. 425, 425-29 (1981); Kornblum, Recent Cases Interpreting the Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing, 30 Def. L.J. 411, 431-32 n.50 mandatory, the agreement prevails over rules of law.35 When, as in the repair contract, the parties have reached an agreement displacing the rule of law, the rule of law is not applicable.36 Thus, courts holding that rules of law are integrated despite the parties' contrary agreement reverse funddamental priorities in determining the terms of the agreement.

If a court holds that the rule of law prevails over the parties' agreement to the contrary, it is because the parol evidence rule which the court is applying prohibits the court from taking into account the actual agreement of the parties.37 The parol evidence rule could exclude proof of the actual agreement on one of two bases: contradiction—the rule of law is integrated as part of the writing38—or total integration—the parties intend their writing to express their complete agreement.39

Many cases that purported to use the first basis actually used the second.40 Therefore, in order to understand the cases concluding that the implied in law term is integrated, it is necessary to review briefly the approaches of various authorities in deciding whether an agreement is fully or partially integrated and to consider how each approach would treat the offered specific time agreement.41 At least in theory, resolving (1981). For a case in which the court declined to imply a term and instead granted relief in restitution, see Nelson v. Gish, 103 Idaho 57, 60, 644 P.2d 980, 983 (1982).

35. E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.1, at 446; Hawkland, supra note 5, at 206.
Because there are no parol evidence rule issues where an alleged term contradicts a mandatory rule of law, all references to rules of law in this Article refer to suppletory, that is non-mandatory, rules of law. See E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.1, at 446.
36. See Kansas City Bridge Co. v. Kansas City Structural Steel Co., 317 S.W.2d 370, 375 (Mo. 1958) ("when an ordinary contract does not state the time for performance, and the parties orally agree on a particular time,' the legal implication that they intended a reasonable time is an implication 'fictitiously invented by the law'") (quoting 3 S.
Williston, Williston on Contracts § 640, at 1840 (rev. ed. 1963)).
37. Although the parol evidence rule may not require an "agreement to the contrary" to be in writing, a specific statute might. See Masterson v. Sine, 68 Cal. 2d 222, 229, 436
P.2d 561, 566, 65 Cal. Rptr. 545, 550 (1968) (en banc) ("[A] statute may preclude parol evidence to rebut a statutory presumption."); Martel Constr. Inc. v. Gleason Equip., Inc., 166 Mont. 479, 482-83, 534 P.2d 883, 884-85 (1975) (where parties entered into written contract, statute providing that time not of the essence unless contract terms expressly so provided barred proof of oral agreement that time was of the essence and took precedence over more "general" UCC parol evidence rule); see also 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 593, at 561 (statutes which fill gaps in the parties' agreement are "not in aid of the parol evidence rule"). Under the UCC, an agreement contrary to a rule of law need not necessarily be in writing. See Brunswick Box Co. v. Coutinho, Caro & Co., 617 F.2d 355, 360 (4th Cir. 1980) (court may look beyond written document to determine whether parties "otherwise agreed").
38. See supra notes 28-29 and accompanying text.
39. See supra notes 26-27 and accompanying text.
40. See infra notes 44-53 and accompanying text.
41. How a court decides whether an integration is total or partial is generally recognized as a key issue under the parol evidence rule. See Calamari & Perillo, supra note 15, at 337; Murray, supra note 21, at 1351-54. This Article addresses this issue only tangentially as it relates to the question of whether implied terms are deemed integrated. For commentary comparing the differing views, see Calamari & Perillo, supra note 15, at 337-45 (comparing Williston and Corbin); Metzger, The Parol Evidence Rule: Promissory Es-toppel's Next Conquest?, 36 Vand. L. Rev. 1383, 1392-97 (1983) (comparing Williston, the issue of whether an agreement is fully or partially integrated depends on the intent of the parties. Accordingly, we should consider in each case what test of intent is used and what extrinsic evidence of intent is considered by the court.

1. The “Four Corners” Rule

Under the earliest approach, the question of total or partial integration was decided solely by the apparent completeness of the writing—the “four corners” approach. If the writing appeared complete on its face, the agreement was conclusively presumed to be fully integrated. If the writing was incomplete on its face, the agreement was only partially integrated.

The difficult question under the “four corners” approach was deciding whether a particular writing was facially incomplete. When the writing itself referred to a separate agreement or indicated that other agreements existed, for example, by referring to a telephone conversation, the agreement generally was held to be partially integrated. But when the writing simply omitted an essential term such as time for performance, the decisions were not uniform. Most courts excluded proof of the offered

---

42. See E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.3, at 452.
43. The question of intent, ordinarily a question of fact, is decided by the court. Id. at 460. But see infra note 86 (discussing Corbin’s view).
44. See McCormick, supra note 20, at 369-71 (1932); Wallach, supra note 41, at 656-58; Is It Necessary?, supra note 7, at 973-75.
45. See, e.g., Seitz v. Brewers’ Refrigerating Mach. Co., 141 U.S. 510, 517 (1891); In re Simplot’s Estate, 215 Iowa 578, 582, 246 N.W. 396, 398 (1933); Grant v. King, 117 Minn. 54, 57, 134 N.W. 291, 292 (1912); Thompson v. Libbey, 34 Minn. 374, 377, 26 N.W. 1, 2 (1885); Davis v. Ferguson, 111 Neb. 691, 696, 197 N.W. 390, 392 (1924); Naumberg v. Young, 44 N.J.L. 331, 339 (1882). The “four corners” approach has been applied relatively recently. See Gulf Ati. Towing Corp. v. Dickerson, Inc., 271 F.2d 542, 546 (5th Cir. 1959). But see United States v. Clementon Sewerage Auth., 365 F.2d 609, 613-14 (3d Cir. 1966) (criticizing “four corners” approach); J. Murray, Contracts § 108, at 236 (2d ed. 1974) (“[T]here is no modern court which would not listen to evidence of the extrinsic matter (as well as inspecting the writing itself) to determine the integration questions.”); Wallach, supra note 41, at 656 (rule today is “largely of historical interest”).
term,\textsuperscript{50} apparently assuming from the writing's silence that the parties had not agreed to a specific time for performance. But because the test of total integration was the facial completeness of the document, these courts frequently justified their holdings by stating that the rule of law, "reasonable time," was read into the writing and thereby completed it.\textsuperscript{51} On the other hand, a minority of cases decided under the "four corners" approach concluded that a writing omitting an essential term was incomplete on its face (a partial integration), and thus admitted proof of the offered term to supplement the written agreement.\textsuperscript{52}

Though the two lines of cases reached opposite results, the reasoning of both was based on the same incorrect premise: that the writing is the contract.\textsuperscript{53} The former found it necessary, in order to complete the writing, to treat the rules of law as though they were part of the document. The latter failed to recognize that if the parties have agreed to only three terms, a writing that expresses those terms is complete though the contract would include obligations supplied by law to fill the gaps. The basic failing of both lines of decisions stems from the attempt to decide the

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{53} The total contractual obligation comprises both the agreement of the parties and obligations imposed by law. See supra note 34 and accompanying text. A written contract, if complete, expresses the entire agreement between the parties, but not the entire contractual obligation.
\end{itemize}
question of whether an agreement is fully or partially integrated by looking within the "four corners" of the document.

2. Williston and the First Restatement

Williston's test for determining whether an integration is total or partial is a liberalization of the "four corners" test because, under Williston's test, facial completeness of the writing does not necessarily result in finding a total integration. Under Williston's highly influential test, adopted by the Restatement of Contracts (First Restatement), even if a written contract is deemed complete on its face, a consistent additional term may be proved if the term is one that parties similarly situated would naturally make and not include in the writing. The First Restatement drafters recognized that "there are cases where it is so natural to make a separate agreement, frequently oral, in regard to the same subject matter, that the Parol Evidence Rule does not deny effect to the collateral agreement."

Williston's rule is similar to the "four corners" approach in at least one respect, however. It is a formalistic test of presumed, not actual, intention of the parties to fully integrate their agreement. Little or no extrinsic evidence need be considered because the question is not what the parties did but what parties similarly situated might normally do.

54. See Wallach, supra note 41, at 660.
55. See J. Calamari & J. Perillo, supra note 11, § 3-3, at 105; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 633, at 1014-16; see also First Restatement, supra note 11, § 229 comment a.
56. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240(1)(b).
57. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 638, at 1039-42; see also First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240(1)(b).
58. First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment d. If the alleged collateral agreement can stand alone as an independent contract between the same parties, it is admissible to provide consistent additional terms without inquiring whether it would have been naturally included in the writing. See J. Calamari & J. Perillo, supra note 11, § 3-3, at 105; 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 584, at 477; First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216(2)(a). The discussion throughout this Article assumes that the offered agreement depends for its validity on the consideration stated in the writing.
59. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 638, at 1037-42; see also Calamari & Perillo, supra note 15, at 337-45 (distinguishing Williston's test of presumed intention from Corbin's inquiry into actual intent). The test has been called a "reasonable man" test of intention, see Wallach, supra note 41, at 659, the "normal and natural" test, see Sweet, supra note 7, at 1038, the "naturalness" test, see Strahorn, The Parol Evidence Rule and Warranties of Goods Sold, 19 Minn. L. Rev. 725, 728 (1935) and the "natural omission" test, see Murray, supra note 21, at 1366.
60. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 638, at 1041 ("The point is not merely whether the court is convinced that the parties before it did in fact do this, but whether parties so situated generally would or might do so."). Comments to the First Restatement, however, seem to be more liberal and to permit broader inquiry into the parties' intent. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment d ("It is not essential that a particular provision would always or even usually be made in a separate collateral agreement. It is enough that making such a provision in that way is not so exceptional as to be odd or unnatural."); see also id. § 228 comment a ("That a document was or was not adopted as an integration may be proved by any relevant evidence."). Corbin argues that "[w]hether
As a practical matter, Williston’s “naturalness” test is a test not only for admission of the evidence but also for exclusion of the evidence. If a consistent additional term would naturally be omitted from the writing it may be proved (the agreement is only partially integrated), but if it would naturally be included in the writing proof of it is barred (the agreement is fully integrated).

How does Williston’s rule apply in the case in which the parties have agreed to a stated completion date but have not included the date in the writing? Williston severely criticized the cases that, under the four corners approach, read in the rule of law “reasonable time” in order to exclude proof of the actual agreement. He approved the results of cases that admitted proof of the actual agreement in preference to applying the “reasonable time” rule, but it is not clear from his discussion on what basis proof of the oral agreement is admissible. It would seem that his “naturalness” test would be even more restrictive than the “four corners” or “facial completeness” test when applied to a case in which an essential term, such as time of performance, is omitted from the writing. The absence from the writing of a term fixing the time for performance is an important omission. By the same token, an alleged agreement fixing a time for performance is such an integral part of the transaction that if the agreement were intended to be part of the contract, one might ordinarily expect the parties to have included it in the writing. Therefore, a court applying an approach to total integration which depends on the facial completeness of the writing could conceivably conclude that the agreement is only partially integrated, whereas a court applying an approach that depends on whether the term is natural to include would generally conclude that the agreement is fully integrated. Thus, if the agreed completion date had to pass Williston’s “naturalness” test, its proof would ordinarily be barred, a result contrary to that which Williston intended.

Presumably to avoid this anomalous conclusion and reach the desired result, the First Restatement indicates that the agreed fixed time term is a naturally omitted term. It uses the following illustration to exemplify an agreement that “‘might naturally be made’ without inclusion in an integrated contract”:

or not it was ‘natural’ for the parties to do as they did bears only on the credibility of the evidence offered.” See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 584, at 480.

61. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 638, at 1040-42; see also First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 & comment c. The statement in the text assumes that the writing is deemed apparently complete. See supra text accompanying notes 55-57 and infra text accompanying note 71.

62. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1054-60.

63. See id. § 640, at 1051-63.

64. See id. § 640, at 1057 n.8 (“more progressive and realistic” to admit evidence of actual agreement “instead of imposing the harsh and arbitrary reasonable time doctrine”) (emphasis in original).

65. First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment d. The First Restatement’s “naturalness” test, when applied in this context, seems so out of place that it is hard to imagine that it would have been used absent the necessity of including the case within the
A and B in an integrated contract respectively promise to sell and to buy specified goods. No time or place for delivery is specified. If no agreement is made as to these matters the rule of law is that the goods are deliverable in a reasonable time at the seller's place of business. A contemporaneous oral agreement that the goods shall be delivered within thirty days, at the buyer's place of business, is operative.

Not surprisingly, the courts have not found the "naturalness" test helpful in this context. The few cases that cite the First Restatement on this issue appear to place their reliance primarily on the illustration rather than the black letter. Williston's treatise avoids the issue but, if anything, indicates blanket admissibility: "[T]he written memorial does not purport to be complete upon its face and the extrinsic evidence does not therefore serve to vary or contradict it." 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1061 (quoting Marcus & Co. v. K.L.G. Baking Co., 122 N.J.L. 202, 207, 3 A.2d 627, 630 (1939)).

The First Restatement's conclusion that the time for performance is a naturally omitted term reveals the underlying purpose of the test as a threshold test of credibility of the evidence: It is not unusual for parties to fix a time for performance, and, it is therefore natural to conclude that such an agreement was made. The test is thereby satisfied. Thus, the "naturalness" test is not necessarily limited to the question of whether it would have been natural for the parties to include the term in the writing. Rather, it questions whether it is natural to conclude that such an agreement was reached and continues to be a viable part of the agreement despite the writing. A contemporaneous oral agreement, as in the illustration, might meet the test more easily than one reached very early in the negotiating process. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment d; see also id. § 240(1)(b) ill 2-7 (five of six illustrations of agreements that "might naturally be made" are "contemporaneous oral" terms); Sweet, supra note 7, at 1065 (written agreement less likely to be fully integrated if oral agreement was made after final contract was prepared for execution).

66. First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240(1)(b) ill 4; see id. § 240(1)(b) ill 5 (omission of route of shipment agreement from writing).

The First Restatement illustration could indicate that the completion date agreement is always operative because such a term is natural to omit from the writing. A comment, however, injects initial doubt by indicating that the offered term must still meet the test of consistency with the integration. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment c. The offered term would be inconsistent with the integration if there is "a clear implication of fact from the writing that it fully expresses the whole bargain in regard to the matter in question." Id.; see 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 639, at 1048 (discussing same implication). Can a writing that omits an essential term ever contain an implication of fact that it "expresses the whole bargain in regard to the matter in question" without an express statement to that effect in something like a merger clause? See infra note 91. The First Restatement illustration, see supra text accompanying note 66, and Williston's treatise suggest that the answer is no. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1061.

This implication may be merely another way of asking the "naturalness" question. See Mitchell v. Lath, 247 N.Y. 377, 385-86, 160 N.E. 646, 649 (1928) (Lehman, J., dissenting). Williston recognized that there is an overlap between the "naturalness" test and the consistency test:

Whether . . . a collateral agreement tends to contradict the implications of the writing . . . will depend in large measure on the question whether a reasonable person making such an agreement as is set up both in the writing and in the preferred parol evidence might naturally have separated the matters into two parts.

4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 639, at 1051.

67. See infra notes 68-69.

68. See, e.g., Kansas City Bridge Co. v. Kansas City Structural Steel Co., 317 S.W.2d 370, 375 (Mo. 1958); Brazil v. Dupree, 197 Or. 581, 597, 254 P.2d 1041, 1044-45 (1953).
than on the “natural to omit” rationale, but most cases that admit proof of the oral agreement resort to the “incomplete on its face” approach. 69

Even Williston does not apply the “naturalness” test in this context. On the contrary, he appears to approve of the cases which have used the “incomplete on its face” rationale. 70 Thus, Williston seems to be substantially in accord with the minority “four corners” cases that concluded that the omission of an essential term indicated that the writing was a partial integration. 71 Interestingly, the First Restatement’s solution is exactly the opposite. It indicates that a written contract which lacks only a time for performance term is complete on its face but an oral agreement fixing time for performance is natural to omit, and may therefore be proved.

3. Wigmore’s Rule

The Wigmore approach to the question of total or partial integration departs from both the “four corners” and the Williston approaches because Wigmore seeks the actual intent of the parties based on all relevant evidence. 72 However, Wigmore’s “chief and most satisfactory” test for determining the parties’ intent is a formalistic one: “whether or not the particular element of the alleged extrinsic negotiation is dealt with at all in the writing.” 73 In the illustration under consideration the answer is no, and therefore the offered term is “probably” admissible. 74 Although the “four corners” and the Williston approaches generally assume total inte-

---

70. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1061 (discussing Marcus & Co. v. K.L.G. Baking Co., 122 N.J.L. 202, 3 A.2d 627 (1939)).

71. See supra note 52 and accompanying text.

The First Restatement uses two primary criteria for admitting evidence of an extrinsic agreement: 1) the writing is incomplete on its face and 2) the term is one that would naturally be omitted. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comments a, d. The First Restatement, however, emphasizes that the first criterion may be used only if the writing itself shows that it is incomplete. See id. comment a. The First Restatement’s use of the second criterion to admit proof of the oral agreement indicates that it views a writing omitting time for performance as complete on its face (though not containing an implication of fact that it expresses the whole bargain, see supra note 66) because the “naturalness” test comes into play only when the writing is complete on its face. Williston uses the same two criteria, see 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 633, at 1014-15, § 638, at 1041, but appears to admit the term because the writing “does not purport to be complete upon its face.” See id. § 640, at 1061.

72. See 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2430, at 98 (“This intent must be sought where always intent must be sought, namely, in the conduct and language of the parties and the surrounding circumstances.”) (emphasis in original) (citations omitted).

73. Id. § 2430, at 99 (emphasis in original). The truth of the offered evidence is assumed for the purpose of making a ruling on its admissibility under the parol evidence rule. See id.

74. See id. (“If it is mentioned, covered, or dealt with in the writing, then presumably the writing was meant to represent all of the transaction on that element; if it is not, then probably the writing was not intended to embody that element of the negotiation.”).
PAROL EVIDENCE AND IMPLIED TERMS

migration when a writing is apparently complete. Wigmore's test does not seem to assume that the integration is either total or partial.

Instead, Wigmore's test attempts to determine whether the parties' writing was intended to cover a certain subject of negotiation.

4. The Uniform Commercial Code Section 2-202

The Code rejects the assumption that "because a writing has been worked out which is final on some matters, it is to be taken as including all the matters agreed upon . . ." Under the Code, an agreement is assumed to be partially integrated "unless the court finds the writing to have been intended also as a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement." Although neither the Code nor the official comments state what extrinsic evidence the court should consider, many decisions have held that the court should consider all relevant evidence on the issue of intent. Thus, in a sale of goods case, agreement on a specific date should be provable unless the parties intend a total integration.

75. See supra note 46 and accompanying text ("four corners") and 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 633, at 1014-15 (ordinarily, written contract must be incomplete on its face before evidence of an additional term is admissible).

76. Wigmore's test avoids the quandary under the "four corners" approach of attempting to decide on the basis of facial completeness alone whether an agreement is fully or partially integrated. See supra notes 50-53 and accompanying text. Williston criticizes Wigmore's test because it is difficult to identify "the particular element of the [alleged] extrinsic negotiation." See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 639, at 1049. But it is equally difficult to identify "the matter in question" in Williston's implication . . . that [the writing] fully expresses the whole bargain in regard to the matter in question." Id. at 1048. See supra note 66.

77. See 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2430, at 99 (emphasis in original).

78. U.C.C. § 2-202 official comment 1(a) (1978). Thus the Code clearly rejects the "four corners" approach. See Wallach, supra note 41, at 667.

Although the intention of the parties is the only textual limitation to the introduction of evidence of a consistent additional term, an official comment adds: "If the additional terms are such that, if agreed upon, they would certainly have been included in the document in the view of the court, then evidence of their alleged making must be kept from the trier of fact." This statement has generally been construed as adding a second ground of exclusion to the intention test stated in the text. Could proof of the specific time for performance agreement be excluded under the "certain to include" test? The answer should be no. The test is obviously derived from the First Restatement test. If it was not a term that would have been naturally included in the writing under the First Restatement test, then a fortiori it is not a term that would certainly be included under the official comment to UCC section 2-202.

83. See, e.g., Luria Bros. & Co. v. Pielet Bros. Scrap Iron & Metal, Inc., 600 F.2d 103, 111 (7th Cir. 1979); Braund, Inc. v. White, 486 P.2d 50, 56 (Alaska 1971); Birnsen v. Bolles, 20 Cal. App. 3d 635, 637-38, 97 Cal. Rptr. 846, 847-48 (1971); Hawkland, supra note 5, at 219; Wallach, supra note 41, at 668. Under this construction the UCC official comment seems objectionable as going beyond the text. Although this issue was raised by the New York State Law Revision Commission, 1 New York State Law Revision Commission, Report and Appendices Relating to the Uniform Commercial Code 368 app. IV (1956), the courts have not expressed the same concern. The reason may be that the courts are accustomed to excluding evidence of offered terms by applying fictitious tests of intent to fully integrate the agreement. See Calamari & Perillo, supra note 15, at 339-40.

84. As Professor Murray explained, "[t]his is the Williston test in a different garb." Murray, supra note 21, at 1369.

85. For a rare case that considered the certainty test in this context, see George v. Davoli, 91 Misc. 2d 296, 397 N.Y.S.2d 895 (Civ. Ct. 1977). Plaintiff (buyer) bought jewelry from defendant (seller) on approval pursuant to a memorandum of sale that did not state any time limit for return if the goods were found unacceptable. Id. at 296-97, 397 N.Y.S.2d at 896. Absent agreement of the parties, the Code would require return within a reasonable time. Id. at 298, 397 N.Y.S.2d at 897; see U.C.C. §§ 2-326, -327 (1978). At trial, seller was permitted to testify, over objection, that the parties had reached a contemporaneous oral agreement that the goods had to be returned by a specific date. See George, 91 Misc. 2d at 297, 397 N.Y.S.2d at 896. In deciding to admit the oral agreement as a consistent additional term the court, after stating "it cannot be said that the written memorandum is a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement since the time of return is an important part of the arrangement between the parties," proceeded to ask: "Is it therefore such an additional term that the parties would certainly have included it in the written document if it had been agreed upon . . .?" Id. at 298, 397 N.Y.S.2d at 897. Relying on Hunt Foods and Indus. v. Doliner, 26 A.D.2d 41, 270 N.Y.S.2d 937 (1966), the court held that it is not such a term because the alleged oral agreement "cannot be precluded as a matter of law or as factually impossible. It is not sufficient that [its] . . . existence . . . is implausible. It must be impossible." George, 91 Misc. 2d at 299, 397 N.Y.S.2d at 897 (emphasis in original) (citation omitted). The Hunt Foods criterion for certainty has been criticized as eliminating the last vestige of a rule of form from the UCC parol evidence rule because under the Hunt Foods definition, the certainty test becomes a pure test of credibility. See Wallach, supra note 41, at 671-72.
5. Corbin’s Approach

Under Corbin’s approach proof of the offered term should ordinarily not reach the trier of fact if no credible evidence supports it or if the parties intended to discharge it by their subsequent agreement. The first question, credibility, should be addressed squarely, without resort to the parol evidence rule as a subterfuge. The second question should be decided using all relevant evidence. Because the second question is based on the actual expressed intentions of the particular parties involved, what similarly situated parties would normally have done is not determinative.

Corbin makes clear that the rule of law, reasonable time, is not integrated and that therefore a contemporaneous oral agreement stating a completion date is operative. Whether a prior agreement on a specific completion date is operative would presumably depend on whether the parties intended to discharge the prior agreement. A merger clause asserted to by both parties could, of course, evidence that intention.

6. The Second Restatement Rule

The Second Restatement was intended to liberalize the First Restatement rule but not to go quite as far as Corbin would have wished. Like

---

86. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 595, at 570-71; see also id. at 571, (“There must be many cases, however, in which the evidence of what the parties said and did, before and at the time of preparing or delivering a writing, is so nearly equal in weight and credibility that the court will desire the aid of a jury’s verdict. If so, there is no law against getting such aid.”).

87. See id. § 582, at 457. For further commentary on the parol evidence rule by Corbin, see id. §§ 532-96; Corbin, The Interpretation of Words and the Parol Evidence Rule, 50 Cornell L.Q. 161 (1965); Corbin, The Parol Evidence Rule, 53 Yale L.J. 603 (1944).

88. See J. Calamari & J. Perillo, supra note 11, § 3-3, at 108-09; 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 588, at 529.

89. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 584, at 480; see also United States v. Clementon Sewerage Auth., 365 F.2d 609, 613-14 (3d Cir. 1966) (following Corbin’s approach, court admitted evidence of an oral cost limit even though it would be usual to include it in the writing).

90. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 593, at 556-57 (weight of authority and better reason support this view). But under Corbin’s view, evidence of a simultaneous oral term is always relevant. See supra note 11.

91. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 578, at 402-03, 411; see also Comment, The “Merger Clause” and the Parol Evidence Rule, 27 Tex. L. Rev. 361, 362-364 (1949) (merger clause is a “clear answer” to the question of the parties’ intent) [hereinafter cited as Merger Clause]. A merger or integration clause is a provision that states that the writing “contains the entire agreement of the parties.” J. Calamari & J. Perillo, supra note 11, § 3-3, at 104. For examples of merger clauses, see Wilso v. Riddle, 128 Conn. 100, 102, 20 A.2d 402, 403 (1941) (“There is no agreement, verbal or otherwise, which is not set down herein.”) and Rinaudo v. Bloom, 209 Md. 1, 9, 120 A.2d 184, 189 (1956) (“This Contract contains the final and entire Agreement between the parties.”).

92. The Reporter of the Second Restatement, Judge Robert Braucher, has explained:

I had started with the original formulation in the First Restatement, and with Professor Corbin’s notes which left very little of the parol evidence rule, and took, I think, a ground that went somewhat short of what Professor Corbin
the Code, the Second Restatement assumes a partial integration “unless the court finds that the agreement was completely integrated.”93 Like Corbin,94 it directs the court to decide the question of total integration by determining the actual intent of the parties based on all relevant evidence.95

It is somewhat surprising, therefore, to find that the Second Restatement’s illustration involving a specific time for performance is more restrictive than that in the First Restatement:

In May A and B exchange properties and agree orally that A will make certain repairs on the property to be conveyed by A to B, the repairs to be finished by October 1. A and B then draw up and sign a memorandum of the repair agreement, specifying all the terms except that the memorandum is silent as to time of performance. If the memorandum is a binding completely integrated agreement, the agreement to finish by October 1 is discharged, and the repairs are to be finished within a reasonable time. The oral agreement as to October 1 may be relevant evidence as to what is a reasonable time.96

The illustration is based on the 1920 case of Hayden v. Hoadley,97 which applied the “four corners” approach to exclude the oral agreement.98

93. Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216(1).

94. A notable departure from Corbin’s approach is the Second Restatement’s application of the parol evidence rule to contemporaneous expressions. See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 215. See supra note 11.

Although the Second Restatement primarily reflects the Corbin view, scattered throughout the comments are references to other approaches including the “appearance of the writing” test, Wigmore’s test, and, most notably, Williston’s “naturalness” test. See Murray, supra note 21, at 1356-72. “[T]o the detriment of courts and lawyers who look to the [Second] Restatement for guidance, virtually every view appears to be represented.” Murray, The Standardized Agreement Phenomena in the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, 67 Cornell L. Rev. 735, 738 (1982).

In fact it may be virtually impossible to have any more than a partial integration under the Second Restatement. Comment a of Section 213 states: “Where writings relating to the same subject matter are assented to as parts of one transaction, both form part of the integrated agreement. Where an agreement is partly oral and partly written, the writing is at most a partially integrated agreement.” Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 213 comment a.

95. Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 210 comment b, § 214(b).

96. Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 213 ill. 3.

97. 97 Vt. 345, 111 A. 343 (1920).

98. Id. at 348, 111 A. at 344-45 (“A written contract which contains no latent ambiguity cannot be qualified, controlled, contradicted, enlarged, or diminished by any contemporaneous or antecedent understanding or agreement; and oral testimony can no more be received to vary or contradict the legal intendment of such a contract than to vary or contradict its express terms.”). The Second Restatement uses this case to illustrate the effect of § 213, comment c on the scope of the integration. Compare id. at 347-48, 111 A. at 344, with Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 213 ill. 3. Professor Murray argues that because the Second Restatement agrees with Corbin and Williston that gap fillers are not integrated and are therefore not protected by the parol evidence rule, see...
Thus, the illustration appears not only more restrictive than the First Restatement but also more restrictive than those cases applying the "four corners" approach which admitted the evidence on the reasoning that the document was incomplete on its face.

To understand the illustration we must understand the broad outlines of the Second Restatement's rules on total integration. Under the Second Restatement, an agreement cannot be totally integrated if the writing omits an offered term that is: beyond the scope of the writing agreed to for a separate consideration or naturally omitted from the writing. The Second Restatement carries forward the First Restatement's "naturalness" test but solely as a test of admissibility of proof of the offered term. Under the First Restatement, the test operates as a test of exclusion as well; i.e., if the term would have naturally been included in an apparently complete written contract proof of the term was barred. Under the Second Restatement, the "naturalness" test is solely a rule of admission, not a rule of exclusion. The Second Restatement adopts the Corbin approach, stating:

[There is no rule or policy penalizing a party merely because his mode of agreement does not seem natural to others. Even though the omission does not seem natural, evidence of the consistent additional terms is admissible unless the court finds that the writing was intended as a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement.]

The Reporter's Note makes clear that only a consistent additional term that would be natural to include in the writing could be rendered inoperative by the parol evidence rule and even then, only on a finding that the agreement is fully integrated. Thus, the Second Restatement's illustration recognizes that, as a matter of logic, an agreed time for performance is natural to include in the writing\textsuperscript{108} but the unwritten term is nevertheless operative unless the court makes an affirmative finding that the parties intended a fully integrated agreement.\textsuperscript{109}

A review of the various approaches used to decide whether an agreement is fully integrated shows that only under the now discredited "four corners" approach was it concluded that the rule of law, "reasonable time," was integrated. The presumption of total integration, combined with the unwillingness of courts to look beyond the writing itself to determine partial integration, built an almost impenetrable barrier to admission of evidence of the offered term. The statement, commonly seen in these cases, that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the legal effect of a writing, was simply another way of stating that the agreement was fully integrated. It was a statement of the effect of the rule's operation rather than a statement of the basis for excluding evidence of the offered term. "Reading in" the rule of law was merely part of courts' overzealous attempts to protect written contracts from supplementation by additional terms. Under the "four corners" approach, it mattered little which rationale the court gave for its decision, contradiction or total integration, because the result was the same—exclusion of the offered term.

With the liberalization of the rules used to determine partial integration and the increasing willingness of the courts to consider extrinsic evidence on the matter, the concept of partial integration has gained tremendous importance. This is, of course, especially true of the UCC and the Second Restatement which assume partial integration, but it is also true under the First Restatement "naturalness" test, which, though formalistic, nevertheless distinctly liberalizes the "four corners" approach.

With the increased importance of partial integration, however, the concept of contradiction also gains in importance as the primary means \textsuperscript{108} Such a term is also within the scope of the integration. See \textit{supra} note 98. Illustration 6 of § 216 of the Second Restatement is not to the contrary: A and B sign a standard form of written agreement for the sale of goods, complete on its face except that a blank for time and place of delivery is not filled in. It is claimed that the writing was signed on the oral understanding that delivery would be made within 30 days at the buyer's place of business. Under Uniform Commercial Code §§ 2-308 and 2-309, the goods would be deliverable, unless otherwise agreed, within a reasonable time at the seller's place of business. The written agreement is not completely integrated, and the oral understanding is admissible in evidence to supplement its terms.

Second Restatement, \textit{supra} note 2, § 216 ill. 6. Apparently the illustration hinges on the blank space and the use of a standardized form. See Second Restatement, \textit{supra} note 2, § 216 comment d; see also Cargill, Inc. v. Fickbohm, 252 N.W.2d 739, 741-42 (Iowa 1977) (contract with blank space for delivery time can be supplemented by oral agreement).

\textsuperscript{109} Professor Murray suggests that proof of the term should be admitted under a "negative 'appearance' test. The matter is simply not mentioned in the writing and, using the Wigmore aid, the evidence is presumably admissible because it neither contradicts, varies, nor adds to the terms of the writing." Murray, \textit{supra} note 21, at 1365.
of excluding evidence of the offered term based on the appearance of the writing itself.\footnote{110} Whether an agreement is fully or partially integrated is logically irrelevant on this issue. Even a partial integration discharges inconsistent agreements of the parties. Therefore, if a rule of law is deemed integrated, any offered term displacing it is automatically deemed discharged without inquiry into the parties' intent to merge all their agreements into the writing.

As stated above, only under the discredited “four corners” approach to partial integration was the rule of law, “reasonable time,” deemed integrated. Can a rule of law ever be integrated under current legal thought? It is possible, of course, for parties to state expressly the rule of law in the written agreement.\footnote{111} But assume the writing is silent. If the parties are aware of the rule of law, it may be possible to infer \textit{as a fact} that they adopted the rule of law as part of their agreement. Is this inference deemed part of the rule of law and therefore protected against contradiction by the parol evidence rule? Some authorities have said yes. In other words, according to these authorities, a rule of law may be part of the integration by implication of fact. This issue is considered below in connection with implications of fact.

\section{B. “Implied in Fact” Terms; Rules of Law as Implications of Fact}

\subsection{1. Williston and the First Restatement}

In contrast to an implication of law, a term supplied by law, an implication of fact is part of the agreement of the parties because it is based on an inference of actual assent of the parties.\footnote{112} According to Williston and the First Restatement, parol evidence is admissible to contradict implications of law but it may not be used to contradict the implied in fact \footnote{110. The issue of contradiction of express terms is not within the scope of this Article. Suffice it to note that the issue is one of the most difficult under the parol evidence rule and has not received uniform treatment. \textit{See} Wallach, \textit{supra} note 41, at 669-76.

112. That the area of implications of fact is a murky one, to say the least, is evidenced by the error in the First Restatement comment on the issue that gives it a meaning contradictory to that intended and that apparently has gone unnoticed for over 50 years:

\begin{quote}
Even where the extrinsic agreement is not in terms contradictory of the integration, there may be a clear implication of fact from the writing that it fully expresses the whole bargain in regard to the matter in question. To contradict such an implication of fact by extrinsic evidence is no more permissible than to contradict the direct words of the writing. In either case the writing is inconsistent with the oral agreement. An implication, however, that is \textit{not [sic]} based on an inference of actual manifestation of assent must be distinguished from an implication made by the law to fill a gap in what has been expressed.
\end{quote}

First Restatement, \textit{supra} note 11, § 240 comment c (emphasis added). Compare the above comment with 4 S. Williston, \textit{supra} note 9, § 640, at 1051-52 ("[A] distinction must be noted between an implication based upon an inference of actual manifestation of assent and an implication made by the law to fill a gap in what has been expressed.")} terms of the writing. Williston specifically addresses the possibility that an implication of law might be part of the integration by implication of fact. The implication of law is part of the integration if it can be inferred from the writing that the parties (1) were aware of the rule of law, (2) contracted with reference to it and (3) adopted it as part of their agreement.

Recognizing that making the distinction between rules of law that become part of the writing and those that do not may be difficult, the First Restatement gives, as an example of the latter, a rule of law designed to fill gaps in the parties' agreement, and as an example of the former, the following: "When a promissory note, and even more clearly a check, states no date of payment, the implication that the instrument is payable on demand is doubtless the only reasonable inference." Although most adults know the rule of law that a check with the date left blank is payable on demand, why does the First Restatement infer from the writing that the parties adopted the rule as part of their agreement? Presumably, when it is clear that the parties are aware of the rule of law it can be inferred that they adopted it as part of their agreement unless they manifest an intention to exclude it. But this inference cannot be drawn when the parties have reached an agreement to the contrary. If, for example, the parties orally agreed to postpone payment of the check for three months and that oral agreement is taken into account,

113. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1051-52; see also First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment c (Implications of fact, those "based on an inference of actual manifestation of assent" are integrated and may not be contradicted. "To contradict such an implication of fact . . . is no more permissible than to contradict the direct words of the writing.").

114. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 615, at 605.

115. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment c ("shadings are almost imperceptible").

116. See id.; see also 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1058-60.

117. First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment c.

Williston's treatise was less definitive on the point. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1058 ("The parties to a negotiable note or a check which does not specify a time of payment probably understand and recognize that the writing is equivalent to a promise to pay on demand . . . .") (emphasis added); see also Unsinn v. Wilson, 285 F.2d 273, 275 (D.C. Cir. 1960) (where note stated no maturity date, parol evidence of agreed maturity date inadmissible because Negotiable Instruments Law completes instrument).

As a further example, Williston mentions the obligation implied from a blank indorsement of a negotiable instrument. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1058 ("The legal implication from a blank indorsement also is perfectly understood by the parties, and the implication may well be given the same effect as if the indorsement were filled out . . . ."); see also Johnson Hardware Co. v. Kempf, 188 Minn. 109, 110, 246 N.W. 663, 665 (1933) (parol evidence inadmissible to qualify unqualified indorsement). But see Alban Tractor Co. v. Harrison, 228 Md. 632, 636, 180 A.2d 862, 864 (1962) (evidence of oral agreement that indorser would not be responsible for payment admissible in suit by payee against indorser).

The Reporter of the Second Restatement suggested more examples: The drawer's obligation to make the check good and his right to stop payment if he does not receive the merchandise. 1971 ALI Proceedings, supra note 11, at 456.

then there is no implication of fact that the parties intended that the instrument be paid on demand. In other words, because the parties are aware of the rule of law, they are aware of the need to “contract out” if they do not wish the rule to apply to their agreement. Why should they also be aware that they must “contract out” in writing on the check?119

Williston criticized courts that purported to exclude evidence of the offered term, “three months for repairs,” because it contradicted “reasonable time,” a term that the law would imply only absent agreement to the contrary.120 These courts were obviously reasoning in a circle. But it is no less circular to state that evidence of the term, “wait three months to cash the check,” is excluded because it contradicts “payable on demand”—an inference that only a non-party reader of the check would draw about the intent of the parties. Yet Williston criticized the circular reasoning in the former case but not the latter.

Williston’s underlying assumption may be that parties who agree to postpone payment on a check ordinarily postdate the check; they do not leave the date blank and make a separate oral agreement on the matter. In other words, an oral agreement postponing payment is not “such an agreement as might naturally be made as a separate agreement by parties situated as were the parties to the written contract.”121 Williston’s implication of fact that the parties adopted the rule of law as part of their agreement would seem to be, therefore, another application of his “naturalness” test.122 If so, Williston perpetuates the confusion created under the “four corners” view when the courts did not make clear whether proof of a term was excluded because of contradiction or because of total integration.123 Just as “reasonable time” should not be “read into” the contract when the parties have agreed to the contrary, “payable on demand” should not be “read in” when the parties have agreed to the contrary. In both cases excluding evidence of the offered term “three months” is based on the use of a formalistic test of total integration rather than on contradiction of the integration.

2. Corbin

Corbin views implications of fact as a matter of interpretation of the

119. Awareness of the parol evidence rule, not awareness of the rule of law, could lead the parties to put their agreement in writing. “The average layman . . . is probably unaware of the [parol evidence] rule’s existence.” Is it Necessary?, supra note 7, at 983-84. If the parties are businessmen or are represented by counsel, it is more likely that their agreement was fully integrated. See Childres & Spitz, Status in the Law of Contracts, 47 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1, 7-8 (1972); Sweet, supra note 7, at 1065-66. That question need not be considered at all if the term is deemed inconsistent.

120. See supra notes 62-63 and accompanying text. “[T]he contradiction is one fictitiously invented by the law when an ordinary contract does not state the time for performance, and the parties orally agree on a particular time.” 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 640, at 1058-60.

121. 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 638, at 1041.

122. See supra notes 56-61 and accompanying text.

123. See supra notes 35-52 and accompanying text.
writing.\textsuperscript{124} Parol evidence is always admissible to help define the meaning of the parties' language.\textsuperscript{125} For example, the express terms of the writing, as interpreted, may show that a particular time for performance was agreed to. If so, the writing is not in fact silent. Furthermore, just as parol evidence may be introduced to show that the written contract as interpreted does cover the term, parol evidence would also be relevant to show that the writing is silent. Suppose, for example, that an actor is hired, as evidenced by a letter agreement, to perform in a play. Duration is not stated in the writing but the parties had orally agreed that the commitment was for three months. Without knowledge of the oral understanding, it could be inferred from the writing that the parties intended the hiring to be for the run of the play.\textsuperscript{126} Parol evidence would be admissible to help determine the meaning of the parties' agreement. The fact that the parties orally agreed that the duration of employment is three months is relevant to show that the writing was not intended to cover the term of duration. Because the writing, by a process of interpretation, is shown to be silent on the term of duration of the employment, the agreed duration is operative as a consistent additional term. Corbin would conclude that the writing is at most a partial integration.

In the First Restatement's check example, the inference that the parties adopted the rule of law "payable on demand" is based on an inference of the parties' intent derived from their written agreement\textsuperscript{127} and therefore is a question of interpretation. Under Corbin's view, the parol evidence rule would not bar evidence of the actual agreement to show that the check was not intended to cover the term of payment date to negate the implication of fact that the check is payable on demand.\textsuperscript{128} \textsuperscript{124} See 3 A. Corbin, \textit{supra} note 7, § 579, at 412-31; id. § 593, at 559-60 & n.91; see also id. § 593, at 556 ("[P]resumptions of law or fact, or the inferences by which the court fills gaps in a contract that is in all other respects in writing, do not themselves constitute any part of the 'integration' that is supposed to be protected against variance or contradiction by the 'parol evidence rule.' ") (emphasis added).

For a case that avoided the parol evidence rule issue of whether the right to sue for breach of contract is part of the integration by taking an interpretation approach, see Delta Dynamics, Inc. v. Arioto, 69 Cal. 2d 525, 527-29, 446 P.2d 785, 786-87, 72 Cal. Rptr. 785, 786-87 (1968) (en bane) (extrinsic evidence considered to determine whether contractual provision providing for termination in case of failure to meet minimum quota was exclusive remedy for breach).

\textsuperscript{125} 3 A. Corbin, \textit{supra} note 7, § 543, at 133-34; Calamari & Perillo, \textit{supra} note 15, at 352.

\textsuperscript{126} The assumption of the text is that the inference can be made from the writing itself. In many cases such inferences have been based on trade practices. \textit{See} Pfleister v. Western Union Tel. Co., 282 Ill. 69, 75, 118 N.E. 407, 409 (1917) (custom of contracting with baseball players for the duration of the baseball season); Wilson v. Hitchcock, 174 N.Y.S. 673, 674 (Sup. Ct. 1919) (custom in theater business of giving actors two weeks notice of termination).

\textsuperscript{127} See \textit{supra} notes 117-18 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{128} See 3 A. Corbin, \textit{supra} note 7, § 587, at 293 n.42 (1971 Supp.).
3. Second Restatement

The Second Restatement adopts Corbin's position that all relevant evidence including parol evidence is admissible on the issue of interpretation.\textsuperscript{129} It also adopts Corbin's view that even if a term is one that would naturally be included in the writing, evidence of it is barred only if the term contradicts the writing or the writing is fully integrated.\textsuperscript{130} Nevertheless, the Second Restatement continues the First Restatement approach on implications of fact. It provides the following illustration, obviously derived from the First Restatement's check example:\textsuperscript{131}

A check states no date of payment, but it is orally agreed that the check will be paid only after six months. The oral agreement contradicts the check. Under Uniform Commercial Code § 3-108 the check is payable on demand, and most competent adults in the United States have reason to know the rule.\textsuperscript{132}

The illustration states as a fact that the parties have agreed to postpone payment of the check for six months. Therefore, the inference drawn by the illustration—that because the parties are aware of the rule of law, they have adopted it as part of their agreement—can only be based on an interpretation of the intent of the parties based on the writing alone, out of the context of the parties' actual agreement. Yet the Second Restatement emphasizes that “[t]he determination whether an alleged additional term is consistent or inconsistent with the integrated agreement requires interpretation of the writing in the light of all the circumstances, including the evidence of the additional term.”\textsuperscript{133} The inference that the parties contracted with reference to the rule of law and adopted it as part of their agreement would be negated by interpreting the writing in light of the “additional term.” Setting up an implication of fact as an absolute barrier to admitting evidence of the actual agreement of the parties is clearly out of step with the Second Restatement's position on interpretation.\textsuperscript{134}

\textsuperscript{129} See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 212 comment b (“Any determination of meaning or ambiguity should only be made in light of the relevant evidence of the situation and relations of the parties, the subject matter of the transaction, preliminary negotiations and statements made therein, usages of trade, and the course of dealing between the parties.”). See supra note 125 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{130} See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216 comment d. See supra note 87-89 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{131} See supra note 117 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{132} Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216 ill. 1.

\textsuperscript{133} Id. § 216 comment b (emphasis added).

\textsuperscript{134} The topic of “private codes,” a topic on the borderline of integration and interpretation, is illustrative of the Second Restatement's position on interpretation. See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 212 ill. 3-4. Can a party to an apparently complete written agreement introduce evidence of a prior agreement to use the word “buy” to mean “sell”? The original Restatement said no. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 231 ill. 2. Corbin disagreed, stating that it is impossible to know whether an extrinsic term contradicts an integrated agreement until that agreement is interpreted. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 543, at 130-31; Calamari & Perillo, supra note 15, at 352. The Second Restate-
Such a barrier is also out of step with the Second Restatement's provisions on partial integration.\textsuperscript{135} While the First Restatement position on implications of fact is consistent with its assumption that an apparently complete written contract ordinarily represents a fully integrated agreement,\textsuperscript{136} the Second Restatement rejects this assumption.\textsuperscript{137} Logically, any approach which rejects the traditional assumption of total integration should also conclude that implications of fact are not part of the integration.\textsuperscript{138} The question of whether an agreement is totally or partially integrated should be asked and resolved before deciding whether an alleged extrinsic term is inconsistent with the implied in fact terms of a writing.\textsuperscript{139}

Arguably, the First Restatement's provisions on implications of fact are consistent with its "naturalness" test.\textsuperscript{140} If the parties are unaware of \textsuperscript{135} See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 212 ill. 4; id., § 212 comment c. The net effect of this position is: 1) an additional agreement not contained in the writing (the private code) is operative and 2) this additional agreement contradicts the meaning that would be given the instrument by one unacquainted with the private code. The Second Restatement justifies the admission of evidence of the private code because the extrinsic agreement does not relate to performance under the contract but only to the meaning of its language. See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 212 comment b, reporter's note (citing 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 540, at 93-94, where Corbin makes this distinction). The Second Restatement's position on private codes, see Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 212 ill. 3-4, seems to indicate that the meaning of the writing has no life of its own apart from the expressed intent of the parties. But the Second Restatement position on implications of fact contradicts this approach. See supra notes 131-33 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{136} See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240(1)(b) comment d; see also 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 633, at 1014-15.

\textsuperscript{137} See supra note 93 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{138} The UCC parol evidence rule, U.C.C. § 2-202 (1978), also rejects the assumption mentioned in the text. See supra note 78 and accompanying text. The initial paragraph of § 2-202 describes what in Second Restatement terminology is an integrated agreement, see Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 209(1), and states the rule that an integrated agreement may not be contradicted, see U.C.C. § 2-202 (1978). The thrust of the paragraph is clearly directed to express terms of the writing: "Terms with respect to which the confirmatory memoranda of the parties agree or which are otherwise set forth in a writing intended by the parties as a final expression of their agreement with respect to such terms as are included therein may not be contradicted . . . ." U.C.C § 2-202 (1978) (emphasis added). In contrast, UCC § 2-202(b), which describes what the Second Restatement would call a fully integrated agreement, see Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 210(1), clearly refers to the entire agreement (including express and implied in fact terms). See American Law Institute, 1956 Recommendations of the Editorial Board for the Uniform Commercial Code 26; Broude, supra note 14, at 886-88; see also U.C.C. § 1-201(3) (1978) (defining "agreement"). See infra note 197 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{139} The Second Restatement states that the issue of total or partial integration is to be decided before the question of interpretation or application of the parol evidence rule. See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 210(3). However, the provisions on partial integration apply only to a consistent additional term. See id., § 216 comment a. Illustration 1 to § 216, see supra text accompanying note 132, indicates that the offered term is inoperative because it contradicts the implication of fact (payment on demand) without inquiry as to whether the agreement (on the instrument) is totally or partially integrated.

\textsuperscript{140} See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240(1)(b).
the rule of law, it is not necessarily natural to include in the writing a term that has the effect of changing the rule of law. On the other hand, if the parties are aware of the rule of law, it may be natural to include the contrary agreement in writing. The Second Restatement, however, has eliminated use of the "naturalness" test to exclude evidence of consistent additional terms. 141 If this test is not conclusive on the issue of intent to merge all agreements into the writing, why should it be conclusive on the issue of consistency? By continuing the First Restatement provision on implications of fact, the Second Restatement has perpetuated a relic.

It has been forcefully argued elsewhere that proof of terms contradicting even the express terms of a writing should not be automatically excluded by the parol evidence rule. 142 Even in the absence of invalidating cause such as fraud or mistake, 143 an oral agreement contradicting the writing could show that the writing was not assented to as a final expression of the agreement. 144 With the increased confidence in the reli-

141. See supra notes 104-09 and accompanying text.

Surprisingly, the remarks of the Reporter of the Second Restatement suggest that he incorrectly believed that the Second Restatement's "naturalness" test is both a test of admission and a test of exclusion as it was under the First Restatement:

[C]arrying forward the principle that was in the original Restatement . . . is the piece in [Section 216(2)(b)] which says that you can show as a side agreement . . . something which in the circumstances might naturally be omitted from the writing. [Professor Corbin] asserts in his treatise, that [it] was Professor Williston's contribution to the law, there is some support in the cases for it, of course, but there is no rule of law, said Professor Corbin, or if there is there ought not to be, that requires people to do things which are natural to other people.

Well, I think with all deference that he is wrong about that, that if you do things in the usual way, it is not surprising that you were thought to have the usual meaning, and to have made the contract that would usually be made in the situation.

Now, what is natural gets very troublesome. One of the leading cases in the New York Court of Appeals [Mitchell v. Lath, 247 N.Y. 377, 160 N.E. 646 (1928)—they divide four to three on whether it was natural or not—sold a piece of farm real estate, residence and farm, with an elaborate written purchase and sale agreement and a side oral agreement that as part of the deal the unsightly icehouse across the street would be torn down.

Now, that was oral, the icehouse agreement. And the trial judge had gone through and made findings that there was such an agreement, it was very clear. Four to three the Court of Appeals said this was too long an agreement to have an oral side agreement like that, and it was superseded by the written agreement and could not be given effect. . . .

Well, the three dissenting judges accepted the principle, but they thought it was quite natural to omit this one.

So I don't know that I have taken sides between the four judges and the three by the formulation here. It is substantially the formulation that was in the original Restatement.

1971 ALI Proceedings, supra note 11, at 454-55. Compare the Reporter’s remarks with Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216 comment d, which clearly adopts the Corbin approach.

143. Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 214(d).

144. See Lakeside Bridge & Steel Co. v. Mountain State Constr. Co., 400 F. Supp. 273, ability of oral testimony and the concomitant decreased belief in the sanctity of written contracts, the arguments in favor of protecting writings against direct contradiction weaken. When the express terms of the writing are silent on the term in question, those arguments should virtually disappear. Wigmore contended that the question of consistency cannot be asked to determine admissibility of an offered term, for if consistency were the test, no offered term would be admitted. His argument is particularly apt when it is claimed that the offered term contradicts a term on which the writing is silent.

The example of the check was used in the above discussion because it is the example that was used by Williston and both Restatements. But these authorities do not limit their reasoning to that context. Thus, their reasoning could extend to a tremendous range of potential implications of fact. Parties in a particular trade are assumed to contract with reference to various practices in the trade. When the parties are clearly aware of those practices, the Restatements' view would seem to be that the practices are part of the parties' written contract by implication of fact. Thus, an oral agreement that changes the implication of fact would be barred as inconsistent even though the writing is only a partial integration. Scholars have long debated whether certain "implied terms" are implications of law or implications of fact. Why should

145. See generally E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.2, at 449 (1982) (courts increasingly receptive to oral testimony because faith in written statements has declined); Wallach, supra note 41 (same).

146. See 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2431, at 102 (questions of whether offered terms "'vary,' or 'contradict,' or are 'inconsistent,' involve the same futility").

147. In the context of a negotiable instrument, the result may be justified if one considers third parties. Negotiable instruments involve particularized policy considerations, e.g., the need for certainty and the ability to rely on a written unconditional promise. See Jordan, "Just Sign Here—It's only a Formality": Parol Evidence in the Law of Commercial Paper, 13 Ga. L. Rev. 53, 55-57 (1978).

148. See U.C.C. § 2-202 official comment (1978); First Restatement, supra note 11, § 246 comment c; Second Restatement, supra note 2, §§ 222-23. On whether proof of the trade usage to supplement the written agreement can itself be barred by the parol evidence rule, see Nanakuli Paving and Rock Co. v. Shell Oil Co., 664 F.2d 772, 796-805 (9th Cir. 1981); First Restatement, supra note 11, § 246 comments b-c; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 220 comment c; 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2440, at 131; Kirst, Usage of Trade and Course of Dealing: Subversion of the UCC Theory, 1977 U. Ill. L.F. 811, 832-36.

149. See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 222.

150. See supra notes 112-14 and accompanying text.

substantive rights depend on subtleties that noted scholars are incapable of resolving? Even if such terms are implications of law, when does it become obvious to a court that an implication of law has become so well known that the parties are deemed to adopt it as part of their agreement?\textsuperscript{152}

As both Restatements recognize, the distinction between rules of law designed to fill gaps and rules of law adopted by the parties by implication of fact may involve "almost imperceptible shadings."\textsuperscript{153} When an almost imperceptible shading results in constructing the fiction that the parties contracted with reference to a rule of law even though there is credible evidence that they did not, the law has not progressed far beyond the state of "primitive formalism."\textsuperscript{154}

Under modern approaches to partial integration and interpretation, it should never be appropriate to exclude automatically as contradictory, evidence of a term as to which the writing is silent. Proof of the offered term should not be barred unless the parties intended to discharge the offered agreement. In other words, the issue of whether an agreement is totally or partially integrated should be addressed before automatically

For an example of a case that did not treat an implied best efforts obligation as an implication of fact for parol evidence rule purposes, see Garden Park Homes Corp. v. Martin Marietta Corp., 507 S.W.2d 368 (Mo. 1974) (per curiam). In that case, a mineral lease provided for extraction of sand for twelve years at a royalty of twelve cents per ton, from the terms of the writing alone, there would have been an implied covenant to use reasonable diligence in extracting sand. Id. at 374. Nevertheless, the court held that the trial court should have admitted evidence that the parties had orally agreed on a yearly minimum royalty of $15,000 even though the oral agreement had the effect of negating the implied term. See id. at 373. See infra notes 239-40.

152. See Walker, supra note 151, at 406 (even if originally implication of law, "[t]he implied covenants, at least in their broad outlines, have become so well established and so widely recognized that it may fairly be said that the parties usually contract with them in mind"); see also 1970 ALI Proceedings, supra note 6, at 481 ("Which came first? Was it the law that made the meaning that people normally have, or was it the meaning that people normally have that led to the rule of law?").

153. First Restatement, supra note 11, § 240 comment c; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216 comment b.

154. See Wood v. Lucy, Lady Duff-Gordon, 222 N.Y. 88, 91, 118 N.E. 214, 214 (1917) ("The law has outgrown its primitive stage of formalism. . . .''); Metzger, supra note 41, at 1386 (parol evidence rule traced to "a primitive formalism which attached mystical and ceremonial effectiveness to the carta and the seal.") (quoting C. McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Evidence § 211, at 430 n.4 (1954)).
excluding evidence of additional terms on the ground of inconsistency with the "implied" terms of the writing.

II. DOES THE PAROL EVIDENCE RULE APPLY TO OBLIGATIONS IMPOSED BY LAW?

Although the parol evidence rule can exclude extrinsic evidence to prove agreements made prior to or contemporaneously with a writing to which the parties have assented, authorities agree that the parol evidence rule does not exclude obligations imposed by law. Even though the court's implication of a term has the effect of adding to the parties' obligations under a written contract, the parol evidence rule is not an objection. Otherwise all applicable rules of law would have to be spelled out in the writing or risk exclusion by the rule. Obviously, no policy served by the parol evidence rule is advanced by reducing the power of the court to govern the contractual relation of the parties.

Nevertheless, when the parties have reduced the terms of their agreement to writing, the courts seem to apply the same criteria to the implication of a term as they do to the admissibility of an oral agreement of the parties. The mere existence of the written agreement, its apparent...

155. See supra note 11 and accompanying text.

For a case that gives undue dignity to a parol evidence argument against implication of a term, see William Berland Realty Co. v. Hahne & Co., 26 N.J. Super. 477, 485-87, 98 A.2d 124, 128-29 (1953), modified per curiam on other grounds, 29 N.J. Super. 316, 102 A.2d 686 (1954). The court countered the parol evidence objection by characterizing the implication as one of fact derived from the writing itself, and stated that although the parol evidence rule "prohibits the modification of a written agreement" by oral evidence, an implied covenant may be recognized as an "articulation of a provision implicit in the agreement and as much a part thereof as if it had been expressly stated." Id. at 485, 98 A.2d at 128.

157. See Fashion Fabrics, Inc. v. Retail Investors Corp., 266 N.W.2d 22, 28 (Iowa 1978) (covenant will not be implied where contract is fully integrated). This practice is ent completeness and detail, its execution after extensive negotiations conducted with aid of counsel, and the presence of a merger clause, all have been used as reasons for refusing to imply an obligation. But on what basis?

A. Silence of Writing as Inference of Intent to Exclude the Implication

Courts commonly apply a rule stating that a court will not imply a term that is dealt with in the writing or on which the written agreement is “intentionally silent.” Of course, if the writing conflicts with a term the court would imply, the writing itself evidences intent to exclude the highlighted by Gerard v. Almouli, 746 F.2d 936 (2d Cir. 1984) which involved both the argument that the court should imply an obligation to use “best efforts” and the offer of parol evidence to prove that the parties had actually agreed to such an obligation. See id. at 939. On the implied obligation, the court noted that the implication will not be made where parties “otherwise agreed.” See id. Because the written contract set out specific obligations, the court concluded that the parties had “otherwise agreed” and therefore it would be “improper to read into the contract a contradictory sales requirement.” Id. The court went on to hold that the “parol evidence argument falls by virtue of the same finding.” Id. The dissent concluded that the written contract was silent as to the “best efforts” obligation, and therefore the court should have admitted parol evidence to determine whether the obligation should be imposed. See id. at 941 (Van Graafland, J., dissenting).

158. See Conservative Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass’n v. Warnecke, 324 S.W.2d 471, 478 (Mo. Ct. App. 1959) (“[W]hen parties reduce their agreements to writing it is presumed that the instrument contains their entire contract, and the court will not read into it additional provisions unless this be necessary to effectuate the intention of the parties as disclosed by the contract as a whole.”). When the parties’ agreement is oral or evidenced by informal writings courts feel free to consult all evidence of the circumstances surrounding the transaction to determine the parties’ obligations. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 522, at 2-3; E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.10, at 492-93.

159. See Goff v. Jacobs, 164 Miss. 817, 825, 145 So. 728, 729 (1933) (Courts are “reluctant” to imply a term “particularly . . . where, as here, the parties have at much pains and in detail undertaken to reduce their agreement to such specific written terms as to evince their purpose to expressly cover every phase of their understanding.”).

160. See HML Corp. v. General Foods Corp., 365 F.2d 77, 81 (3d Cir. 1966) (“[W]here the bargain is the result of elaborate negotiations in which the parties are aided by counsel . . . it is easier to assume that a failure to make provision in the agreement resulted not from ignorance of the problem, but from an agreement not to require it.”).

161. See Vacuum Concrete Corp. of Am. v. American Mach. & Foundry Co., 321 F. Supp. 771, 774 (S.D.N.Y. 1971) (“[T]he merger or integration clause . . . negates the thought that they intended to impose . . . a duty upon AMF” not contained in the contract); Detroit Trust Co. v. Engel, 192 Mich. 62, 64, 158 N.W. 123, 124 (1916) (merger clause excluded implied warranty). But see Havel v. Kelsey-Hayes Co., 83 A.D.2d 380, 384, 445 N.Y.S.2d 333, 336 (1981) (court properly held that the merger clause did not prevent implication of a promise to exercise reasonable diligence, but went on to make the overbroad statement that the purpose of the merger clause is “to preclude consideration of matters extrinsic to the agreement”). A merger clause does not bar consideration of extrinsic evidence for all purposes. See infra notes 216-29 and accompanying text. For consideration of the issue in the context of the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, see infra notes 216-30 and accompanying text.

162. See, e.g., So Good Potato Chip Co. v. Frito-Lay, Inc., 462 F.2d 239, 241 (8th Cir. 1972); Foley v. Eulster, 214 Cal. 506, 511, 6 P.2d 956, 958 (1931) (per curiam); Glass v. Mancuso, 444 S.W.2d 467, 478 (Mo. 1969).
term. But assume that the writing is silent on the obligation in question. How does a court decide that a written agreement is "intentionally silent?" If the existence of an apparently complete written contract raises an inference of exclusion, then it is as though the court is applying the principles underlying the parol evidence rule to the implication of a term.

A court might suspect that a party is urging the court to imply a term that the party was unable to obtain through negotiation. The parties might have discussed the term during negotiations and either never agreed on it or agreed tentatively but later excluded the term in their final agreement. If such discussions actually took place, they may or may not be admissible. But if no such evidence is introduced and admitted, there is no reason to infer exclusion from the writing's silence. It is obviously unrealistic to assume that the parties had all possible obligations in mind when the writing was executed. At most, silence evidences absence of intent on the issue.

Absence of intent is relevant to an implication of fact but not to an implication of law. Because an implication of fact is based on an inference of intention, the silence of an apparently complete writing could conclusively indicate absence of the requisite intent. But the court's ability to impose the same obligation as an implication of law remains unaffected. The parties' silence indicates absence of intent, not intent to exclude the term.

163. See So Good Potato Chip Co. v. Frito-Lay, Inc., 462 F.2d 239, 241 (8th Cir. 1972) (negative covenant by Frito-Lay not to sell competing products in the franchise territory not implied where a "paragraph . . . of the . . . franchise agreement expressly deals with the sale of products by Frito-Lay in the franchised territory."); see also Goetz & Scott, The Limits of Expanded Choice: An Analysis of the Interactions Between Express and Implied Contract Terms, 73 Cal. L. Rev. 261, 312 (1985) (problem of distinguishing between "supplementary expressions and trumps").

164. In Local 461, Int'l Union of Elec., Radio & Mach. Workers v. Singer Co., 540 F. Supp. 442, 447-49 (D.N.J. 1982), plaintiff claimed a provision in the contract implied a guarantee that Singer would keep its Elizabeth, New Jersey plant open. The court stated, "[i]f the union had been able to wrest a guarantee of continued employment from the company, words embodying that promise would have appeared explicitly in the agreement." Id. at 448. While not finding such a guarantee, the court concluded that the provision in question obligated Singer to use best efforts to keep the plant efficient and that Singer had breached that obligation. Id. at 449. For an example of bold judicial gap filling, see J.C. Millett Co. v. Park & Tilford Distillers Corp., 123 F. Supp. 484 (N.D. Cal. 1954), in which plaintiff made repeated unsuccessful efforts to obtain a fixed term or termination provisions in a liquor distributorship agreement. See id. at 488. Defendant refused to agree to such provisions. See id. The court, stating that defendant's refusal to give a fixed term or termination provisions nonetheless contemplated a continuing relationship, see id. at 491, held that the duration of the contract was a reasonable time (one year) and terminable only on reasonable notice (three months). See id. at 493.

165. See Vacuum Concrete Corp. of Am. v. American Mach. & Foundry Co., 321 F. Supp. 771, 773 (S.D.N.Y. 1971); Farnsworth, supra note 6, at 873.

166. See infra notes 237-49 and accompanying text.

167. Farnsworth, supra note 6, at 869. See supra note 5.
B. Effect of Recognition that Implication is Based on Rule of Law, Rather than Inference of Intent

When the term to be supplied is clearly recognized as a rule of law applying to the transaction, no inference of exclusion by silence is made. For example, a contract for the sale of goods which is silent on the subject of warranties does not raise an inference that implied warranties are excluded. A contract for the sale of the assets of a business including goodwill imposes on the seller an obligation to refrain from direct solicitation of the seller's former customers because that conduct would destroy the value of the goodwill, but the contract's silence on direct solicitation raises no inference that the implied covenant is excluded. When the implied term falls clearly within the duty of good faith and fair dealing which applies to every contract, silence evidences no intentional exclusion. Rather, an agreement excluding an obligation imposed by law must be clear and unambiguous. Thus, the extent to which the court will assume exclusion by silence will vary inversely with the court's willingness to view the implication as a settled rule of law which applies to the parties' agreement.

The inference of exclusion by the silence of an apparently complete writing is rarely the primary basis for the decision not to imply the term. Rather, the primary basis is that the legal criteria necessary for implication of a term did not exist. Furthermore, when the implication of a

168. The gap filling provisions of Article 2 of the UCC, which apply absent agreement to the contrary, clearly illustrate this approach. See U.C.C. § 2-303 to -311 (1978). Article 2 mandates the obligation of best efforts in an exclusive dealing contract unless the parties agree otherwise. See id. § 2-306(2). Thus, silence would not constitute an agreement to the contrary.

169. See infra notes 184-85 and accompanying text.

171. See supra note 2 and accompanying text.

172. See Bergum v. Weber, 136 Cal. App. 2d 389, 393-94, 288 P.2d 623, 626 (1955) ("If without the implied obligation the fruits of the contract would be denied to one of the parties, the intent that such an obligation should not exist must clearly appear from the express terms of the contract.").

173. Bonner v. Westbound Records, Inc., 76 Ill. App. 3d 736, 748, 394 N.E.2d 1303, 1311 (1979) ("The doctrine announced in Wood v. Lucy involving an implied promise of good faith performance has become such an integral part of contract law that contractual terms should not be construed to negate it where they are ambiguous or subject to a contrary interpretation."); see also Stone v. Caroselli, 653 P.2d 754, 756-57 (Colo. Ct. App. 1982) (distribution's duty under UCC § 2-306(2) to use best efforts in exclusive dealing contract to promote the sale of the product not negated by a contractual provision giving distributor the discretion to designate number and location of sales outlets); Furrer v. International Health Assurance Co., 256 Or. 429, 438-40, 474 P.2d 759, 763-65 (1970) (promise to use best efforts implied although contractual provision stated "plaintiff 'agrees to spend such time as he personally sees fit' in developing agency agreements and personal sales").

174. In Conservative Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Warnecke, 324 S.W.2d 471 (Mo. Ct. App. 1959), lessee alleged that lessor had an implied duty to notify lessee of an increase in the average rent before the lease's escalator clause became operative. See id. at 477. The court reversed the trial court's holding that such a covenant should be implied: "The escalator clause is clear and definite in its terms. It omits any reference to term is necessary for the very existence of a valid contract, the completeness and formality of the writing which are said to militate against the implication of a term have the opposite effect. They militate for the implication of a term because the court can infer that the parties intended a contract, not a nullity.\textsuperscript{175}

In summary, the adoption of a writing should have no effect on the court’s ability or willingness to make an implication of law despite sporadic statements in the decisions to the contrary. An implication of law is made unless the parties have expressed an intent to exclude it. Whether or not such a contrary agreement must appear in the writing itself is discussed in Parts I and IV but it is clear, at least, that the silence of the writing is not by itself such an expression.

\section*{III. \textbf{Does the Parol Evidence Rule Exclude Extrinsic Evidence Necessary to Establish an Obligation Imposed by Law?}}

Under the great weight of authority, the parol evidence rule does not exclude evidence extrinsic to the writing to establish an obligation imposed by law.\textsuperscript{176} The parol evidence rule is not meant to preclude all inquiry into the circumstances surrounding a transaction.\textsuperscript{177} At most, the parol evidence rule can have the effect of forcing parties to put all their agreements relating to a particular transaction into writing at the risk of being unable to prove those that are omitted from the writing. The rule does not cut off a court's ability to consider circumstances surrounding a transaction which are relevant to deciding whether to impose an obligation.

Sometimes extrinsic evidence is necessary to establish an obligation imposed by law. In a percentage lease, for example, the lessee may promise to pay the lessor a fixed sum plus a percentage of the profits. In such cases, most courts have implied a promise on the part of the lessee to use best efforts to produce profits if the fixed sum is nominal, but not if it is substantial. Some courts will imply a promise even where the fixed sum is more than nominal, provided it is significantly below the proof of an oral condition precedent to the effectiveness of a written agreement. See Pym v. Campbell, 6 Ellis & Bl. 370, 374, 119 Eng. Rep. 903, 905 (Q.B. 1856); 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 589, at 530-32; First Restatement, supra note 11, § 241; Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 217; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 634, at 1021-26. But see Wallach, supra note 41, at 654 (“This exception to the parol evidence rule is difficult to justify.”). It does not prevent reformation of the instrument. See First Restatement, supra note 11, § 238(c); Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 214(e); Palmer, supra note 14, at 833. The “common law exceptions” to the parol evidence rule are available under the Uniform Commercial Code. See J. White & R. Summers, supra note 78, § 2-11, at 88-89; Broude, supra note 14, at 890-902.

For a comparison of the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds, see 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 575, at 380-82. If the implication is one of fact, but not from the writing alone, the parol evidence rule may bar evidence to prove it. See supra notes 24 and 148. Thus the parol evidence rule could bar evidence of words or conduct to add terms to a fully integrated agreement. The need to decide whether extrinsic evidence is being used to prove an implied in fact or implied in law term is avoided by courts that take an expansive interpretation approach. Evidence of the circumstances of the transaction, including statements made, are then considered in interpreting the agreement as a whole. See, e.g., Onderdonk v. Presbyterian Homes, 85 N.J. 171, 182, 187, 425 A.2d 1057, 1062-63, 1065-66 (1981) (implied agreement that defendant would not use money paid by nursing home residents to improve defendant's other nursing homes and implied incidental obligation to provide plaintiffs with “meaningful” financial statements); see also Quader-Kino A.G. v. Nebenzal, 35 Cal. 2d 287, 289, 293-94, 217 P.2d 650, 651, 655 (1950). See infra note 239.

For a case that admitted proof of the term under both theories, interpretation and partial integration, see Paccuan, Inc. v. United States, 399 F.2d 162 (Ct. Cl. 1968). In that case, proof of an oral promise was deemed admissible to aid in interpreting the contract and also as an additional term of the agreement because it was “the type the defendant would naturally make . . . without including it in the formal written agreement.” Id. at 171 n.11.

The parol evidence rule does not bar extrinsic evidence introduced to show that the fixed rental is merely nominal or at least significantly below the fair market value of the property at the time of the agreement.

A. Example of Implied Warranty of Fitness for a Particular Purpose

A number of warranties arise by operation of law in a sale of goods transaction, most of which require little or no introduction of extrinsic evidence. The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose is a notable exception. It arises when the seller has reason to know of the buyer's particular purpose and that the buyer is relying on the seller's skill or judgment.

Does the parol evidence rule bar evidence of negotiations between parties to prove the facts establishing an implied warranty of fitness? At common law the prevailing view was that it did not because the parol

---

183. See E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.17, at 531 n.24.

184. Mechem, Implied and Oral Warranties and the Parol Evidence Rule, 12 Minn. L. Rev. 209, 218 (1928); Moye, supra note 156, at 596; Note, Warranty Disclaimers and Limitation of Remedy for Breach of Warranty Under the Uniform Commercial Code, 43 B.U.L. Rev. 396, 400 (1963) [hereinafter cited as Warranty Disclaimers]. Aside from the express warranties of UCC § 2-313, Article 2 of the U.C.C. recognizes five warranties: the implied warranty of merchantability, UCC § 2-314(1) (1978), the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, id. § 2-315, implied warranties arising from a course of dealing or usage of trade, id. § 2-314(3), the warranty of title, id. § 2-312(1), and the warranty against infringement, id. § 2-312(3). Of these, only the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose and any implied warranties added by course of dealing or usage of trade require much significant inquiry into matters extrinsic to the writing. For a recent extensive discussion of UCC Article 2 warranties, see Special Project, Article Two Warranties in Commercial Transactions, 64 Cornell L. Rev. 30 (1978). On the importance of clearly distinguishing the implied warranties of merchantability (fitness for ordinary purpose) and fitness for a particular purpose, see Covington & Medved, The Implied Warranty of Fitness for a Particular Purpose: Some Persistent Problems, 9 Ga. L. Rev. 149, 149-51 (1974).

185. The warranty of title arises from the mere fact of sale. U.C.C. § 2-312(1) (1978). The implied warranty of merchantability arises when the seller is "a merchant with respect to goods of that kind." Id. § 2-314(1). The warranty against infringement arises when the seller is "a merchant regularly dealing in goods of the kind." Id. § 2-312(3).

186. Where the seller at the time of contracting has reason to know any particular purpose for which the goods are required and that the buyer is relying on the seller's skill or judgment to select or furnish suitable goods, there is unless excluded or modified under the next section an implied warranty that the goods shall be fit for such purpose.

188. See Strahorn, supra note 59, at 733-35.

189. In these cases, the extrinsic evidence is more closely related to the negotiations than are facts of market value in the percentage lease cases. The credibility of the parties may be at issue when testifying about what the buyer told the seller about his particular purpose or how the seller responded. But the parol evidence rule cannot police the credi-
Evidence rule does not apply to obligations arising by operation of law.\(^{190}\) Commentators unanimously agreed.\(^{191}\) Does the UCC parol evidence rule apply to the facts necessary to prove an implied warranty of fitness? The answer under the Code, as it was at common law, should be no.\(^{192}\) But, because two important commentators have recently, without explanation, said it does,\(^{193}\) this Article will enumerate some of the reasons.

ability of all oral evidence wherever a written contract exists. See Sweet, supra note 7, at 1052.

190. See, e.g., United States Credit Bureau, Inc. v. Powell, 121 Cal. App. 2d Supp. 870, 871-72, 264 P.2d 229, 230-31 (1953) (reversing trial court's refusal to allow parol evidence to prove breach of implied warranties); McDonald v. Sanders, 103 Fla. 93, 98-100, 137 So. 122, 125 (1931)(extrinsic evidence to prove implied warranties not precluded by parol evidence rule); John A. Roebling's Sons Co. v. Southern Power Co., 142 Ga. 464, 469, 83 S.E. 138, 140-41 (1914) (same); Nettles v. Imperial Distr. Inc., 152 W. Va. 9, 15, 159 S.E.2d 206, 210 (1968) (same). For listings of further cases, see Buchanan v. Dugan, 82 A.2d 911, 914 & nn.4-6 (D.C. 1951); Strahorn, supra note 59, at 735 n.28; Parol Warranties, supra note 156, at 864 n.47. The implied warranty of fitness for a particular use is a "warranty which attaches itself to the contract of sale, independent of any express representation by the manufacturer of the suitability of the machinery for such use." International Harvester Co. of Am. v. Bean, 159 Ky. 842, 846, 169 S.W. 549, 550 (1914). But see Bowser & Co. v. Independent Dye House, Inc., 276 Mass. 289, 295-96, 177 N.E. 268, 270 (1931) (parol evidence rule precludes extrinsic evidence to prove implied warranty of fitness). For a discussion of whether a merger clause operates as a "waiver" (disclaimer) of the implied warranty, see infra notes 216-29 and accompanying text.

191. See, e.g., 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 585, at 488, § 593, at 563; E. Farnsworth, supra note 25, § 7.16, at 525 n.27; 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 643, at 1084-85; Mechem, supra note 184, at 218-20; Merger Clause, supra note 91, at 365.

Professor Strahorn gives a broader reach to the parol evidence rule than Williston, who limits the applicability of the rule to "agreements," see 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 643, at 1084, because Strahorn applies it to "facts dehors a writing," see Strahorn, The Unity of the Parol Evidence Rule, 14 Minn. L. Rev. 20, 20 (1929). In the context of warranties, Strahorn applies the rule to "jurally unfavorable statements" (assuming absence of fraud) because these are natural to include in the writing. See Strahorn, supra note 59, at 747-51. This characterization covers a promissory ("prophetic") express warranty ("This car will do well on rough roads."). See id. at 729-30. It does not cover statements and facts giving rise to an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, (Buyer: "I need a car for rough roads;" Seller: "Take this model.") because it is not natural to include these in the writing. See id. at 731, 733-36. Thus, Strahorn would not make the parol evidence rule's operation turn on whether the warranty was promissory or implied in law (as Williston does), but rather on whether it would be natural to include the operative facts in the writing. See id. at 732. His thesis is that it is natural to omit operative facts giving rise to implied warranties from the writing. See id. at 746-47, 750-51. The Second Restatement also takes the position that implied warranties are naturally omitted from the writing. See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216(2)(b) comment d & ill. 9. See infra note 193.

192. See supra notes 190-91 and accompanying text.

193. See E. Murphy & R. Speidel, Studies in Contract Law 746-47 (3d ed. 1984); see also 9 J. Wigmore, supra note 9, § 2434, at 115 n.3 (indicating that evidence giving rise to implied warranty of fitness can be excluded by parol evidence rule).

Some confusion may be caused by the Second Restatement's use of implied warranties in § 216 illustration 9 as examples of comment d, "Terms omitted naturally":

A and B sign a written agreement, complete on its face, for the sale of a specific machine by A to B. The writing describes the machine and warrants that it is new, but contains no other terms relevant to warranty. Warranties of title, conformity to the description, merchantability, or fitness for a particular why the UCC parol evidence rule does not apply to proof of an implied warranty of fitness.

The Code’s parol evidence rule prohibits contradiction of the final writing by “any prior agreement” or by “a contemporaneous oral agreement.”194 If the writing is “intended also as a complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement,” the UCC bars evidence of even “consistent additional terms.”195 Thus, the UCC parol evidence rule applies only if the extrinsic evidence is introduced to prove an “agreement” or “term.” Therefore, whether extrinsic evidence may be introduced to prove an implied warranty of fitness depends on whether the implied warranty is either an “agreement” or “term.” Both of these words are defined in the Code. “Term” is defined as “that portion of an agreement which relates to a particular matter.”196 Thus the definition of “term” directs us to the definition of “agreement.” “Agreement” is defined as “the bargain of the parties in fact as found in their language or by implication from other circumstances.”197 At least for purposes of Article 2, “agreement” includes a present sale.198 Does it include the warranties imposed by law on the sale? The Code carefully distinguishes between the concepts of “agreement” and “contract.” “Contract” is defined as “the total legal obligation which results from the parties’ agreement as affected by this Act and other applicable rules of law.”199 The definitional sections of “contract” and “agreement” make cross-references to each other with the direction to “compare,” thus pointing out to the reader that although the word “contract” includes obligations imposed by law, the word “agreement” does not.200

Because the implied warranty of fitness doubtlessly arises by operation of law and not by virtue of the parties’ assent,201 the two commentators purpose, arising under Uniform Commercial Code §§ 2-312 through 2-315, are not excluded. Whether an additional oral warranty of quality is superseded depends on whether the agreement is completely integrated.

Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216(2)(b) ill. 9. However, a term that “might naturally be omitted” is admissible even if the parties assented to the writing as the complete and exclusive statement of their agreement. Id. § 216(2)(b) comment a. Therefore, the Second Restatement view does not contemplate potential exclusion of the implied warranty of fitness by the UCC’s parol evidence rule, UCC § 2-202(b).

195. Id. § 2-202(b).
196. Id. § 1-201(42).
197. Id. § 1-201(3). The word “bargain” is not defined in the Code. Mellinkoff, The Language of the Uniform Commercial Code, 77 Yale L.J. 185, 189 (1967). The Second Restatement defines “bargain” as “an agreement to exchange promises or to exchange a promise for a performance or to exchange performances.” See Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 3.
199. Id. § 1-201(11). Section 2-106(1) defines “contract for sale” as both a present sale of goods and a contract to sell goods in the future. Id. § 2-106(1).
200. See id. §§ 1-201(3), (11). The Code, however, is not always consistent in maintaining this distinction. See Mellinkoff, supra note 197, at 189.
201. See John A. Roebling's Sons Co. v. Southern Power Co., 142 Ga. 464, 469, 83 S.E. 138, 140 (1914) (implied warranty of fitness “is an implication which the law itself who characterized it as a "term of the agreement" seem to have lost sight of this important limit on the concept of "agreement." The facts necessary to prove the implied warranty of fitness are not subject to the parol evidence rule because they are not introduced to prove a "term of the agreement" but to prove an obligation imposed by law.

The warranty provisions of the Code add further support to this analysis. Section 2-315 states that an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose exists by virtue of the circumstances of the sale unless excluded or modified under section 2-316. Thus, the only exclusionary mechanism mentioned for the implied warranty is section 2-316. Section 2-316, in turn, distinguishes between express and implied warranties. The subsection dealing with express warranties makes a cross-reference to the UCC parol evidence rule, section 2-202, yet none of the subsections relating to disclaimer of implied warranties contain that cross-reference. This suggests that, although express warranties are subject to the parol evidence rule, the implied warranty of fitness is not.

In addition, although the official comments to the warranty provisions refer to the parol evidence rule, no such references are made with respect to proof of circumstances necessary to establish an implied warranty. Although the Code’s warranty sections and official comments do not expressly preclude applying the parol evidence rule to the facts necessary to give rise to the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, they imply that the rule does not apply.

The case law under the Code agrees. Cases under the Code consider the parol evidence rule in connection with allegations of express warranties but do not apply the parol evidence rule to implied warranties such as those of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose.

Textual analysis of the UCC parol evidence rule, negative inferences from the warranty provisions and the comments thereto, and the case law construing the Code support the suggested analysis. Nevertheless, it might be argued that the UCC parol evidence rule would apply to the implied warranty of fitness if the Code were intended to expand the coverage of the parol evidence rule. The opposite is true. Although a few cases state that the UCC parol evidence rule does not change the common law rule, most cases and commentators view the Code’s formula—

---

209. See generally U.C.C. § 2-312 to -316 official comments (1978).
210. See, e.g., Appeals of Reeves Soundcraft Corp., 2 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. (Callaghan) 210, 219 (ASBCA 1964); Moye, supra note 156, at 606; Warranty Disclaimers, supra note 184, at 400. The same conclusion was reached under the Uniform Sales Act. See, e.g., Buchanan v. Dugan, 82 A.2d 911, 913 (D.C. 1951); Bekkevold v. Potts, 173 Minn. 87, 90, 216 N.W. 790, 791 (1927).
212. Appeals of Reeves Soundcraft Corp., 2 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. (Callaghan) 210, 219 (ASBCA 1964); Moye, supra note 156, at 606; Warranty Disclaimers, supra note 184, at 400; see also Computerized Radiological Servs. v. Syntex Corp., 595 F. Supp. 1495, 1508-09 (E.D.N.Y. 1984) (only disclaimer provisions, not parol evidence rule, considered on issue of existence of implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose).

In Thorman v. Polytemp, Inc., 2 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. (Callaghan) 772 (N.Y. County Ct. 1965), the written sales agreement included both a merger clause and a valid disclaimer. See id. at 774. The court held that extrinsic evidence to prove an implied warranty of fitness was barred by the Code’s parol evidence rule, § 2-202. See id. Because the implied warranty is not a “term” of the “agreement,” § 2-202 is inapplicable to it. See supra notes 194-200 and accompanying text. The court seems to have applied the broad evidentiary common law parol evidence rule that any extrinsic evidence is inadmissible to contradict a provision of a written contract, in this case, the disclaimer provision. See 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 631, at 948-49. It has been forcefully argued in the context of trade usage and course of dealing that applying the broad evidentiary common law parol evidence rule in a UCC case to exclude any extrinsic evidence which apparently contradicts a final writing causes confusion and even a subversion of UCC theory. See Kirst, supra note 148, at 832-36.
213. Compare S S. Williston, supra note 9, § 654, at 60 (parol evidence rule principles applicable to trade usage used to supplement written contract) with Kirst, supra note 148, at 35 (“[E] evidence of usage of trade . . . is not excludable parol evidence under section 2-202 . . .”)
214. See, e.g., Green Chevrolet Co. v. Kemp, 241 Ark. 62, 64, 406 S.W.2d 142, 143
tion of the rule as less restrictive than the common law rule. Certainly there is no authority for the proposition that the Code rule is intended to exclude more evidence than was excluded under the prior law.

B. Effect of Merger Clause

Does a merger clause exclude an implied warranty or extrinsic evidence necessary to establish implied warranties? At common law, the cases were in conflict, but the majority view was that it did not. The reason for the apparently conflicting decisions was that resolution of the issue depended on the interpretation of the merger clause. If the merger clause was interpreted as a mere paraphrase of the assumption made by the traditional parol evidence rule, it did not exclude implied warranties. If the merger clause was interpreted as an expression of intent to exclude any unwritten obligation (including one imposed by

216. See, e.g., United States Gypsum Co. v. Schiavo Bros., 668 F.2d 172, 175 (3d Cir. 1981) (implied covenant in lease to return premises in same condition as received not negated by merger clause), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 961 (1982); Sperry Rand Corp. v. Industrial Supply Corp., 337 F.2d 363, 371 (5th Cir. 1964) (merger clause does not bar recovery on implied warranty of fitness for use); Bekkevold v. Potts, 173 Minn. 87, 92-93, 216 N.W. 790, 791 (1927) (merger clause may be so worded so that implied warranties are not excluded); 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 578, at 411-12 (merger clause does not necessarily preclude existence of implied warranties); 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 643, at 1079 & n.6 (same); Merger Clause, supra note 91, at 365-66 (only merger clauses which expressly exclude implied warranties should have that effect); Moye, supra note 156, at 605 (merger clause does not necessarily preclude existence of implied warranties); see also Buchanan v. Dugan, 82 A.2d 911, 913-14 (D.C. 1951) (merger clause did not bar evidence of implied warranty on hearing aid); Hughes v. National Equip. Corp., 216 Iowa 1000, 1004-05, 250 N.W. 154, 156-57 (1933) (evidence of implied warranty on machines sold not barred by merger clause); Ideal Heating Co. v. Kramer, 127 Iowa 137, 143, 102 N.W. 840, 842 (1905) (merger clause "does not exclude an implied warranty where one would otherwise be found"). But see Detroit Trust Co. v. Engel, 192 Mich. 62, 64, 158 N.W. 123, 124 (1916) (merger clause in contract excluded implied warranty); F.A. North Co. v. Beebe, 11 N.J. Misc. 759, 760, 168 A. 632, 633 (1933) (same); Rockwood & Co. v. Parrot & Co., 142 Or. 261, 269-72, 19 P.2d 423, 426-27 (1933) (same); 4 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 643, at 1078-79 (some cases hold that merger clause excludes implied warranties); Parol Warranties, supra note 156, at 867 (statement in a final writing that the writing contains the entire agreement is an express disclaimer of implied warranties).

217. See 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 578, at 412 ("Here, as elsewhere, the process of interpretation leads to results that seem to be inconsistent and conflicting so far as can be determined from the court opinions.").

218. See Sperry Rand Corp. v. Industrial Supply Corp., 337 F.2d 363, 371 (5th Cir.
law), the merger clause was a disclaimer.\(^1\) The outcome of the cases often depended on the language of the particular merger clause.\(^2\) On the whole, there was a tendency to interpret them narrowly against exclusion,\(^3\) but particularly when the writing contained an express warranty in addition to the merger clause, the merger clause was sometimes given the effect of a disclaimer.\(^4\)

In sum, the common law cases concerning merger clauses grappled with the question of whether the merger clause acted as a disclaimer of the implied warranties, not with whether a merger clause excludes reference to the parties' negotiations establishing an implied warranty.

Because the Code parol evidence rule is inapplicable to obligations imposed by law,\(^5\) proof of the implied warranty of fitness is admissible even though the merger clause signifies that the parties intended their \(^{1964}\); Ideal Heating Co. v. Kramer, 127 Iowa 137, 143, 102 N.W. 840, 842 (1905); 5 S. Williston, supra note 9, § 811, at 887.

In Sperry Rand, the seller had made prior written representations of fitness for use which were excluded by an integration clause. See Sperry Rand, 337 F.2d at 365-66, 370. Even though an express warranty of fitness for use was barred by the parol evidence rule, the court admitted the written representations to prove an implied warranty of fitness for use. See id. at 371. The court stated: "[W]here the alleged verbal warranty sought to be established is only what would be implied, evidence thereof does not change the legal effect of the contract, and is therefore admissible." Id. (quoting McDonald v. Sanders, 103 Fla. 93, 99, 137 So. 122, 125 (1931)).

Where, however, a term has been discussed in early negotiations and then dropped or where a party refused to include a promise in the written contract, the courts have sometimes concluded that the term was intentionally excluded and refused to imply the same term. See supra notes 164-65, infra note 239 and accompanying text.

219. See Bagley v. General Fire Extinguisher Co., 150 F. 284, 286-87 (2d Cir. 1906), appeal dismissed, 212 U.S. 477 (1909); Parol Warranties, supra note 156, at 867. 220. Compare Bekkevold v. Potts, 173 Minn. 87, 90, 216 N.W. 790, 791 (1927) (Merger clause stated: "No warranties have been made . . . by the seller to the buyer unless written hereon." None were written. The court held that because only express warranties are "made" by seller, the parties did not intend to exclude implied warranties.) with Bagley v. General Fire Extinguisher Co., 150 F. 284, 285, 287 (2d Cir. 1906) (Merger clause stated: "It is explicitly understood and agreed that no obligations other than herein set forth . . . shall be binding upon either party." The court held this language to mean that "no warranties should be attached to the contract except those that were 'set forth' in terms."). appeal dismissed, 212 U.S. 477 (1909).

221. See Parol Warranties, supra note 156, at 867-68, 870; see also United States Credit Bureau v. Powell, 121 Cal. App. 2d Supp. 870, 871-72, 264 P.2d 229, 230-31 (1953) ("Obviously, the statement in the written contract that it contains the entire agreement of the parties cannot furnish . . . an avenue of escape from the entirely reasonable obligation implied in all contracts to the effect that the work performed 'shall be fit and proper for its said intended use.'") (quoting Kuitems v. Covell, 104 Cal. App. 2d 482, 485, 231 P.2d 552, 554 (1951)); J.B. Colt Co. v. Bridges, 162 Ga. 154, 158, 132 S.E. 889, 891 (1926) ("The assertion of the implied warranty of [fitness for particular purpose] does not in any way conflict with the stipulations of the written contract of sale that the instrument contains all the agreements of the parties."); Bekkevold v. Potts, 173 Minn. 87, 90, 216 N.W. 790, 791 (1927) ("We must conclude that the parties did not intend to exclude the implied warranty which could easily have been done in unmistakable terms had they so chosen.").

222. See supra note 219 and accompanying text.

223. See supra notes 192-215 and accompanying text.
writing to be a “complete and exclusive statement . . . of the agreement.”224 If the merger clause is to affect implied warranties under the Code it is strictly as a disclaimer that meets the requirements of UCC section 2-316(2). Although a warranty of fitness for a particular purpose can be disclaimer under that section with general language,225 a simple statement that the writing contains the entire agreement of the parties should not qualify because it does not manifest an intention to exclude implied warranties.226 An additional protection under that section, the requirement of conspicuousness,227 will prevent even a merger clause that explicitly refers to implied warranties from acting as a “secret disclaimer.”228 If a simple merger clause could exclude an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, the Code’s policy of protecting buyers by a conspicuous disclaimer would be subverted. That policy requires both conspicuousness and language of disclaimer, not of merger.229

In conclusion, the parol evidence rule does not exclude extrinsic evdence to establish an obligation imposed by law. The issue has been raised frequently in connection with the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.230 Despite the assertions of some recent commentary, this warranty should not be considered a “term” of the “agreement” under the Code. Thus, neither the parol evidence rule nor a simple merger clause excludes implied warranties or the extrinsic evidence necessary to establish them.

224. U.C.C. § 2-202(b) (1978); see Duckworth v. Ford Motor Co., 211 F. Supp. 888, 891 (E.D. Pa. 1962), rev’d in part on other grounds, 320 F.2d 130 (3d Cir. 1963); J. White & R. Summers, supra note 177, § 2-12, at 90; see also Buchanan v. Dugan, 82 A.2d 911, 913-14 (D.C. 1951) (reaching this conclusion under the Uniform Sales Act). But see Moye, supra note 156, at 607 (“The fact that the buyer has signed an agreement which states that it represents the entire contract between the parties tends to show that he is willing to waive all of the prior negotiations” including the circumstances necessary to establish the implied warranty.).

The Second Restatement states that “if agreed to [a merger clause] is likely to conclude the issue whether the agreement is completely integrated. Consistent additional terms may then be excluded even though their omission would have been natural in the absence of such a clause.” Second Restatement, supra note 2, § 216 comment e. This statement is made just after illustration 9 to § 216 in which a number of implied warranties are characterized as “[t]erms omitted naturally.” Id. ill. 9. The Second Restatement’s suggestion that implied warranties might be natural to include in the writing in view of a merger clause is untenable and, presumably, unintentional.

225. See U.C.C. § 2-316(2) (1978). In the 1952 draft of the Code, an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose could be disclaimed only by specific language. Ezer,

The Impact of the Uniform Commercial Code on the California Law of Sales Warranties,

226. See supra note 216 and accompanying text.

228. See Hogan, The Highways and Some of the Byways in the Sales and Bulk Sales

Articles of the Uniform Commercial Code, 48 Cornell L.Q. 1, 7, 9 (1962).

229. See U.C.C. § 2-316(2) (1978). But see E. Murphy & R. Speidel, supra note 193, at 747 (suggesting that conspicuous “manifestation of intention to integrate the writing” would exclude implied warranties).

230. See supra note 216 and accompanying text.
IV. MAY PAROL EVIDENCE BE INTRODUCED TO HELP DEFINE THE MEANING OF AN IMPLIED TERM?

It is frequently held that, even if the parol evidence rule excludes extrinsic evidence of the parties' agreement submitted to prove the agreement,\(^{231}\) the same evidence is admissible to help define the meaning of the term the law implies to fill the gaps in the parties' written agreement.\(^{232}\) Thus, courts have frequently admitted evidence of the parties' actual agreement to help define the meaning of "reasonable time,"\(^{233}\) and occasionally of "best efforts."\(^{234}\) One commentator has pointed to these decisions as anomalous.\(^{235}\) The author respectfully disagrees. Although parol evidence is considered by the jury, the jury uses it to determine the scope of an already established legal obligation as applied to the particular facts of the case. It is one thing to admit evidence of the conversations of the parties to prove that the repairer had a duty to complete repairs within three months, and another to admit the same evidence to determine what amounts to a reasonable time under the circumstances.\(^{236}\)

\(^{231}\) This could occur if the agreement is fully integrated or if the court deems the implied term to be part of the integration. See \textit{supra} notes 26-39 and accompanying text.

\(^{232}\) \textit{See}, e.g., \textit{American Historical Soc'y v. Vestal}, 189 Ark. 651, 652-53, 74 S.W.2d 964, 965 (1934); \textit{Epstein v. Paganne, Ltd.}, 44 A.D.2d 520, 520, 353 N.Y.S.2d 190, 192 (1974) (per curiam); \textit{see also} 3 A. Corbin, \textit{supra} note 7, § 593, at 557-59; Second Restatement, \textit{supra} note 2, § 204 comment e, § 213 ill. 3; 4 S. Williston, \textit{supra} note 9, § 640, at 1051-53.

\(^{234}\) \textit{See} Epstein v. Paganne, Ltd., 44 A.D.2d 520, 520, 353 N.Y.S.2d 190, 191 (1974) (per curiam) (trial court should have heard evidence of parties' understanding to determine meaning of "best efforts"); \textit{see also} \textit{Paccon, Inc. v. United States}, 399 F.2d 162, 170-71 & n.11 (Ct. Cl. 1968) (consideration of pre-contract discussions does not violate the parol evidence rule because they do not contradict anything in the contract but merely "spell out and trigger . . . the latent obligation . . . of the Government to take reasonable steps to coordinate the work"). \textit{Cf.} \textit{Kubik v. J. & R. Foods, Inc.}, 282 Or. 179, 183-84, 186 n.5, 577 P.2d 518, 520, 521 n.5 (1978) (suggesting parol evidence would have been admissible on issue of whether the good faith was that of a buyer in an exclusive dealing contract, UCC § 2-306(2) (implied good faith obligation to promote the product), or that of requirements buyer, UCC § 2-306(1) (good faith in determining requirements)). \textit{But see} \textit{Local 461 of the Int'l Union of Elec., Radio and Mach. Workers v. Singer Co.}, 540 F. Supp. 442, 446-47 (D.N.J. 1982) (parol evidence inadmissible to show that one party was obligated to continue in business where the contract was unambiguous and fully integrated); \textit{United States v. Wallace & Wallace Fuel Oil Co.}, 540 F. Supp. 419, 427 (S.D.N.Y. 1982) (express best efforts clause not "inherently ambiguous").

\(^{235}\) \textit{See} Sweet, \textit{supra} note 7, at 1039.

\(^{236}\) \textit{See} Second Restatement, \textit{supra} note 2, § 204 comment e ("Where there is complete integration and interpretation of the writing discloses a failure to agree on an essential term, evidence of prior negotiations or agreements . . . may be admissible, if relevant, on the question of what is reasonable in the circumstances.").
It is clear that when a party seeks to add a term to an integrated agreement, evidence of the offered term may be excluded if the agreement is fully integrated. But suppose the party seeks to prove an agreement that merely negates a term the law would imply without seeking to prove a substituted term. The issue does not generally arise in time of performance or duration cases. In the former, a time for performance cannot be negated completely. Because the obligation to perform is expressed, the performance must occur within some time limit. In the latter, when duration of performance is at issue, an agreement negating duration need not ordinarily be proved because the usual implication is that the duration of the performance is terminable at will. In other words, no duration is implied.

The issue has sometimes arisen, however, in the case of an implied obligation of best efforts. In this context the courts have been willing to look at evidence of the negotiations that show such an obligation was excluded. Even though such obligations are often termed "implied by fact," they are not treated as part of the writing for parol evidence purposes.

The issue also arises in the case of disclaimer of warranties. Suppose a seller makes an oral disclaimer or a prior written disclaimer that is not included in the final writing. An express warranty found in the writing itself would no doubt exclude proof of the disclaimer as contradictory. Would an implied warranty be "read into" the writing to exclude

---

237. See supra note 11 and accompanying text.
239. See, e.g., Vacuum Concrete Corp. v. American Mach. & Foundry Co., 321 F. Supp. 771, 774-75 (S.D.N.Y. 1971) (best efforts assured during negotiations but omitted from written contract); Eastern Elec., Inc. v. Seeburg Corp., 310 F. Supp. 1126, 1145-51 (S.D.N.Y. 1969), aff’d, 427 F.2d 23 (2d Cir. 1970) (court considered in detail prior proposals and drafts of the agreement; particularly telling was an early proposal which included an express “best efforts” clause which was later dropped and replaced by other provisions); see also Quader-Kino A.G. v. Nebenzal, 35 Cal. 2d 287, 288, 294-95, 217 P.2d 650, 651, 655 (1950) (interpretation of two written contracts “with the aid of parol evidence”, revealed that plaintiff’s right to exhibit motion picture had expired and therefore defendant was under no implied obligation “not to interfere with plaintiff’s acquisition of an extension of [those] rights [nor] to use [defendant’s] own independently acquired . . . license to prevent plaintiff from exploiting [motion picture]”); Garden Park Homes Corp. v. Martin Marietta Corp., 507 S.W.2d 368 (Mo. 1974) (per curiam) (oral agreement for fixed minimum royalty supplementing mineral lease introduced though it negated implied covenant to use reasonable diligence to extract sand).
240. If they were, the oral agreements would be excluded as contradictory because implications of fact are generally considered part of the integration. See supra note 112-13, 131-32 and accompanying text.
241. See infra note 242.
proof of the disclaimer as contradictory? Cases decided under the traditional "four corners" view took this approach. One commentator has proposed asking whether the particular purpose of the buyer is stated in the writing. He argues that if it is, the seller would naturally include the disclaimer in the writing in order to protect himself. His failure to do so causes proof of the oral disclaimer to be excluded by the parol evidence rule. Under this approach the result would presumably change if extrinsic evidence had to be considered to determine that the seller had reason to know of the buyer’s particular purpose. Corbin argues that because the implied warranty is imposed by law, proof of an agreement disclaiming it is admissible in every case.

Under the UCC, admissibility of the disclaimer as a term of the agreement presumably depends on whether there is a total or partial integration. An official comment indicates that UCC section 2-202 may bar proof of an oral disclaimer. The negative implication, therefore, is that unless the parties intend a total integration, proof of the oral disclaimer may be admitted as a consistent additional term. It might be argued, of course, that proof of the disclaimer is inadmissible because the parties would certainly have included the disclaimer in the writing.

One case that considered the admissibility of evidence of a parol disclaimer held such evidence inadmissible when the written agreement contained a merger clause. Another avoided the question by holding that proof of the disclaimer was admissible as a course of performance. Because course of performance is subsequent to the integration it can never be excluded by the parol evidence rule.

Suppose evidence of the oral disclaimer is admitted to prove a consistent additional term but the oral disclaimer is ineffective because it is not made by a conspicuous writing as required by UCC section 2-316(2).

242. See, e.g., Calpetro Producers Syndicate v. Charles M. Woods Co., 206 Cal. 246, 252-53, 274 P. 65, 67-68 (1929) (warranty of title read in to exclude evidence of oral disclaimer as contradictory); La France v. Kashishian, 204 Cal. 643, 645, 269 P. 655, 656 (1928) (implied warranty of title of lessor of real property read in to exclude evidence that lessee knew of defect in title and that the defect was taken into account in setting the terms of the lease).

243. See Strahorn, supra note 59, at 729 & n.15.

244. 3 A. Corbin, supra note 7, § 585, at 488, § 593, at 559.

246. See supra notes 82-83 and accompanying text.

248. See Robinson v. Branch Moving & Storage Co., 28 N.C. App. 244, 250, 221 S.E.2d 81, 85 (1976). The evidence introduced was not properly characterized as course of performance, see U.C.C. § 2-208(1) (1978), because it apparently consisted of statements made prior to or contemporaneously with the written sales contract. See Robinson, 28 N.C. App. at 249, 221 S.E.2d at 84.

250. A disclaimer of the implied warranty of fitness under UCC § 2-316(2) must be
An official comment indicates that “whether or not language of disclaimer satisfies [UCC section 2-316(2)] such language may be relevant . . . to the question of whether the warranty was ever in fact created.”

Suppose instead, that the parol evidence rule does bar proof of the oral disclaimer to supplement the written terms of the sales contract. May proof of the disclaimer be introduced on the issue of whether the implied warranty arose? The Code is unclear. An official comment states that it is admissible for that purpose unless prevented by “the provisions of this Article on parol and extrinsic evidence.” The answer should be yes, for if it were not, the buyer would have it both ways. As has already been seen, the parol evidence rule does not prevent the buyer from introducing extrinsic evidence to prove the operative facts that give rise to the implied warranty.

It would be anomalous, as well as unfair, if the buyer could introduce evidence of conversations to prove the warranty but the seller could not introduce evidence of an oral disclaimer to disprove the warranty. Although inadmissible as proof of a term of the agreement, evidence of the oral disclaimer would be relevant to show the seller had no reason to know of the buyer's reliance or that the buyer did not actually rely on the seller.

Therefore, even if under the parol evidence rule the disclaimer is inoperative as a term, and even if it is invalid as a disclaimer due to failure to comply with the requisite formalities under the Code, evidence of it should nevertheless be admissible to show that the circumstances of the sale do not justify imposing an implied warranty.

CONCLUSION

This Article sheds some light on an area of the parol evidence rule seldom addressed by commentators—the relation between the parol evidence rule and implication of terms. If one conclusion can be reached, it is that the terms on which the writing is silent, but which are implied by law or implied in fact, should not be treated as though they were written, thereby excluding, under the parol evidence rule, proof of the actual agreement of the parties.

Finally, the parol evidence rule does not exclude reference to the negotiations of the parties for all purposes. It is irrelevant to the issue of whether the court should consider evidence, including negotiations, in

\[251.\] See U.C.C. § 2-316 official comment 5 (1978). ("[O]ral language of disclaimer may raise issues of fact as to whether reliance by the buyer occurred and whether the seller had 'reason to know' under the section on implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.")

\[253.\] See supra notes 189-215 and accompanying text.

\[254.\] See supra note 251.

made by a conspicuous writing. See U.C.C. § 2-316(2) (1978). A disclaimer under UCC § 2-316(3) such as "as is" or "with all faults" does not require a writing. See id. § 2-316(3).
determining whether to imply a term or otherwise impose a legal obligation on the parties' agreement.