DEALER LOCATION CLAUSES AND THE PER SE RULE: FROM SCHWINN TO GTE SYLVANIA

I. Introduction

Restraints affecting trade can be termed either "horizontal" or "vertical." A horizontal restraint exists if competitors "at the same level of the market structure" agree to minimize competition. The effect of such a restraint is to lessen substantially or eliminate interbrand competition in a particular area. Thus, consumers are given no choice between brands when purchasing a particular product. Such limitations are per se violations of section 1 of the Sherman Act.

A vertical restraint results from an agreement between firms at "successive stages of the distribution system." A vertical restraint may limit intrabrand competition, but consumers and distributors alike might actually benefit from such a restriction depending upon

Section 1 of the Sherman Act reads in pertinent part:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal . . . .

It has been held that the Sherman Act:

> [R]ests on the premise that the unrestrained interaction of competitive forces will yield the best allocation of the country's economic resources, the lowest prices, the highest quality and the greatest material progress, while at the same time producing an environment conducive to the preservation of our democratic political and social institutions.

3. See, e.g., Note, Exceptions to Schwinn's Per Se Rule: Their Validity and Implications for the Future, 31 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 643, 646 (1974). For example, a vertical restraint may occur between a manufacturer and a wholesaler, a wholesaler and a retailer, a manufacturer and a retailer, or they may occur as a result of an agreement among all three levels of a particular distribution system. Id.

4. Proponents of vertical restraints argue first, that distributors would be unwilling to handle a manufacturer's product unless they are afforded some protection against "cutthroat" intrabrand competition; second, restraints are necessary to prevent dealers from invading another dealer's territory and relying on the latter's advertising, while the former dealer saves promotional costs, and therefore, reaps greater profits; third, such restraints are designed to motivate dealers to increase their depth of coverage in narrowly defined areas rather than "skimming" choice customers over a wide area, and fourth, such restraints insulate a dealer from intrabrand competition, thus providing the dealer with the necessary
the degree to which competition was limited.\textsuperscript{5}

In a recent decision, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the legality of a dealer-location clause,\textsuperscript{6} which designated the location of the dealer's place of business and required the manufacturer's approval as a prerequisite to the dealer opening a second outlet at a new location, should be judged under the "rule of reason."\textsuperscript{7} The purpose of this Note is to examine vertically imposed dealer-location clauses, to view their effect upon competition and consumers, and to determine whether such restraints are per se illegal\textsuperscript{8} under section 1 of the Sherman Act, or whether they require analysis under the rule of reason.\textsuperscript{9}

\section{The Per Se Rule}

\textit{United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co.}\textsuperscript{10} marked a change in the attitude of the Supreme Court\textsuperscript{11} towards vertically imposed terri-

9. See Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231 (1918). Restraints analyzed under the rule of reason require a consideration of the facts peculiar to the business in which the restraint is applied, the nature of the restraint and its effects on competition, and the history of the restraint and the reason for its adoption. \textit{Id.} at 238.

11. Four years earlier in \textit{White Motor Co. v. United States}, 372 U.S. 253 (1963), the Supreme Court declined to adopt a per se rule for vertical territorial and customer restrictions. The Court stated:
torial and customer restrictions. Schwinn marketed its bicycles either by direct sale, by consignment, or through an agency relationship to wholesale distributors or to franchised retailers. It instructed the distributors to sell only to franchised Schwinn accounts and only in their respective territories. Similarly, Schwinn franchised retailers only as to designated locations, authorized them to sell only to consumers and not unfranchised retailers, and required them to purchase only from or through the distributor authorized to serve that particular area. The net effect of this system was to prevent intrabrand competition.

While indicating that "an appraisal of the market impact" of the Schwinn restraints was appropriate, the Court reached for the so-called "ancient rule against restraints on alienation" and proceeded to establish a per se rule. Conveniently, the Court failed to note that this common law rule of property law was not of the per se variety. It ruled that any attempt to restrain alienation of a product after parting with title and risk is per se unreasonable and in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act, regardless of any business justification.\textsuperscript{19}

In dissent, Justice Stewart argued that invalidation of franchising arrangements would force suppliers to abandon franchising and to integrate forward to the detriment of small business.\textsuperscript{20} He found no justification to accord different treatment to a sale, as opposed to a consignment or agency relationship.\textsuperscript{21} Justice Stewart concluded that the use of the ancient rule against restraints on alienation was not proper because the rule historically proscribed only unreasonable restraints.\textsuperscript{22} Finally, he argued that contemporary business problems required a "more reasoned and sensitive" approach than the simple acceptance of the ancient rule.\textsuperscript{23}

Broadly stated, \textit{Schwinn} stands for the proposition that all post-sale vertical restraints are per se illegal. However, two Supreme Court Justices have stated that \textit{Schwinn} applied the "rule of reason."\textsuperscript{24} Numerous legal commentators have criticized the soundness of the decision,\textsuperscript{25} and at least one commentator has classified the

Such irrelevant formulae are false guides to sound adjudication in the antitrust field: "Our choice must be made on the basis not of abstractions but of the realities of modern industrial life." \textit{Id.}, citing \textit{Standard Oil Co. v. United States}, 337 U.S. 293, 320 (1949) (opinion of Douglas, J.). \textit{See also} note 19 \textit{supra}.

Herald Co.}, 390 U.S. 145, 155-56 (1968) (Douglas, J., concurring).

  Chief Justice Burger has stated, that in \textit{Schwinn}, "the Court made it clear that it was proceeding under the 'rule of reason,' and not by per se rule . . . ." \textit{United States v. Topco Associates, Inc.}, 405 U.S. 596, 617-18 (1972) (Burger, C.J., dissenting) (footnote omitted).
Such a label attaches, because the Government did not ask for a per se rule and because such a rule required the overruling in part of previous case law. Additionally, the rule could be used to stifle the resourcefulness of small business and modern marketing methods. Moreover, through the use of "consignment" or "agency" methods of distribution, the effect of the rule could be avoided.

When judging the legality of a restraint unaccompanied by another per se violation, courts must first determine whether the restraint is horizontal or vertical. If horizontal, the inquiry can end because a finding of a per se illegality is appropriate. If vertical, it is arguable that courts should look to the impact of the restriction on the marketplace. Thus, for vertical restraints which completely eliminate competition, such as some territorial and customer restrictions, the courts seem willing to find a per se violation. However, for those vertical restraints having a less onerous effect on competition, the courts often apply the rule of reason. For example, in United States v. Glaxo Group Ltd., a vertically imposed customer restriction on the resale of drugs, allegedly to insure the maintenance of uniform health and safety standards, was held to be a per se violation. The court concluded that any possibility of applying the rule of reason to a sale situation was foreclosed by Schwinn. In Adolph Coors Co. v. FTC, the Tenth Circuit indicated that it was "compelled" to apply the Schwinn per se rule to vertically imposed territorial restrictions, but also "believed" that the Supreme Court should make an exception when a unique prod-

Similarly, the \textit{Schwinn} per se rule has been applied to vertical prohibitions affecting the resale of trading stamps to a particular customer,\textsuperscript{40} and where the enforcement of vertically imposed territorial and customer restrictions effectively prevented a wholesaler from purchasing herbicides.\textsuperscript{41}

\section*{III. Exceptions to the Per Se Rule}

\subsection*{A. Partial Restraints}

Some restraints do not completely eliminate competition. Such restraints dictate specific policies for the distribution of goods, but they do not limit the sale of goods to a geographically defined territory or to any particular class of customers. Seemingly, these restraints are susceptible to inclusion within the literal language of \textit{Schwinn}. However, they have been upheld against claims that they fall within the prohibitions of \textit{Schwinn}'s per se rule.\textsuperscript{42} Included among these devices is the dealer-location clause.\textsuperscript{43}

In \textit{GTE Sylvania, Inc. v. Continental T. V., Inc.}, the appellant manufacturer, Sylvania, implemented its "elbow room policy" (\textit{i.e.}, a "straight line distribution system") under which sales were made from the factory to franchised dealers, who in turn sold to consumers.\textsuperscript{44} Through franchising, Sylvania hoped to strengthen its market share position by expanding its dealer base.\textsuperscript{45} The elements of this policy included dealer-location constraints,\textsuperscript{46} whereby the franchisee agreed not to sell Sylvania products from a location other than the Continental, an authorized Sylvania dealer already franchised to sell in several locations, sought the manufacturer's approval to sell Sylvania merchandise from a new location. After Sylvania failed to approve, Continental proceeded to sell Sylvania goods at the new location without the manufacturer's approval.

Allegedly due to concerns over the dealer's ability to satisfy its debts, Sylvania terminated Continental's franchise. Continental sought damages, asserting that Sylvania's "elbow room policy" was a policy in restraint of trade, constituting a per se violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act.

The district court judge submitted a jury instruction incorporating the theory of per se illegality espoused in Schwinn, and the jury

Additionally, Sylvania learned that Continental had increased its obligations to Philco, while maintaining a high credit limit with Sylvania. Further, obligations owed to Sylvania by Continental and held by Maguire for the benefit of Sylvania were past due. Continental indicated that all obligations would be paid, as soon as, the dispute over the locations practice was resolved.

As a result of their concern, Sylvania placed a credit hold on Continental's orders and reduced its credit line from $300,000 to $50,000. Continental reacted by withholding all payments due. Thereafter, Maguire repossessed Sylvania goods in Continental's possession, levied attachments on Continental's place of business and bank account, and caused the closing of some of Continental's stores and warehouses. Similarly, Continental's bank terminated Continental's consumer financing program and called for the payment of a commercial loan. Id. at 985.

Therefore, if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that Sylvania entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy with one or more of its dealers pursuant to which Sylvania exercised dominion and control over the products sold to the dealer, after having parted with title and risk to the products, you must find any effort thereafter to restrict outlets or store locations from which its dealers resold the merchandise which they had purchased from Sylvania to be a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, regardless of the reasonableness of the location restrictions.
returned a verdict in favor of Continental.\textsuperscript{58} Also, the court found that Sylvania's credit concerns were not the true reasons for its actions\textsuperscript{59} and entered a limited injunction prohibiting Sylvania from enforcing its locations clause.\textsuperscript{60} The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that the district court judge committed error in submitting a per se instruction and that the legality of the locations clause should be judged under the rule of reason.\textsuperscript{61}

The majority reasoned that \textit{Schwinn} had been applied too literally and without reference to its facts.\textsuperscript{62} For example, Schwinn's territorial and customer restrictions absolutely prevented dealers from selling to customers outside of their designated territory.\textsuperscript{63} However, Sylvania's dealers could advertise and sell to customers from any area, and "were limited only as to the location of the franchisee's place of business."\textsuperscript{64} The effect of the Schwinn restrictions was to destroy intrabrand competition, because a potential purchaser could buy only from the authorized dealer for his territory.\textsuperscript{65} In contrast, Sylvania franchised at least two dealers in major markets, thus preserving intrabrand competition by giving the potential purchaser a choice between competing dealers.\textsuperscript{66}

While conceding that the locations practice did "check" intrabran-
brand competition to a certain extent,\textsuperscript{67} the court of appeals concluded that "rather than unreasonably restricting competitive market forces, [the practice] actually had a procompetitive effect."\textsuperscript{68} It enabled Sylvania, a marginal producer, to achieve the status of a viable competitor\textsuperscript{69} in an oligopolistic industry.\textsuperscript{70} The court stated:\textsuperscript{71}

Whether some diminution in intrabrand competition is justified when it averts the loss of one competitor in an industry that is already oligopolistic should ultimately be a question for the finder of the facts. Our choice of a rule of reason test over a \textit{per se} rule of illegality means only that the critical policy question will at least be asked and answered.

As further justification for a rule of reason test the court looked to decisions involving exclusive dealerships.\textsuperscript{72} In \textit{Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc. v. Hawaiian Oke & Liquors, Ltd.},\textsuperscript{73} the Ninth Circuit concluded that it was not a \textit{per se} violation for a manufacturer to give a distributor an exclusive franchise, even if it meant "cutting off another distributor."\textsuperscript{74} Accordingly, the \textit{Sylvania} majority argued that if exclusive dealerships are legal, it must also be legal to enforce the promise of exclusivity by withholding from maverick dealers, such as Continental, the power to sell from an unauthorized location within the first dealer's exclusive territory.\textsuperscript{75} In contrast,

The adoption of a \textit{per se} rule might diminish the capacity of the small, independent franchisee to compete with the large vertically integrated giants. For example, if a single franchisee expanded and sold everywhere in violation of a contract provision, it would be impossible for other single outlet franchises of the same manufacturer to compete effectively. Id. at 999.
the dissent saw a distinction between a manufacturer's restricting his own behavior through the use of exclusive dealerships and restricting an independent franchisee through the use of a locations clause. Concededly, a distinction between the two practices exists, but in order to insure that an exclusive dealership has its intended effect, a manufacturer must have the power to deny other dealers the right to sell within an existing exclusive territory.

The Ninth Circuit also argued that locations clauses had never been struck down for illegality. For example, prior to Schwinn, in Boro Hall Corp. v. General Motors Corp., a clause which fixed the location for the sale of used cars by a dealer "at such a place as would not unduly prejudice other dealers" was held a reasonable restraint of trade. Moreover, after Schwinn, in Salco Corp. v. General Motors Corp., the Tenth Circuit held that a location clause was valid as a matter of law. Similarly, the Third Circuit affirmed a summary judgment in favor of an auto manufacturer against an allegation of an illegal location clause.

Vertical restraints, such as "area of primary responsibility" and "profit pass over" clauses, are far more burdensome than location clauses. Nevertheless, these restraints have been upheld under the rule of reason. Thus, lower courts have demonstrated a willingness to abandon the Schwinn per se rule for these less than complete restraints on alienation. These courts have also evidenced a desire to look to the effect of such restraints on competition.

See Hobart Brothers Co. v. Malcolm T. Gilliland, Inc., 471 F.2d 894 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 412 U.S. 923 (1973) (silent understanding translated a "primary responsibility" clause into a per se illegal restriction).

B. Outright Restraints on Alienation

By utilizing the specific language of Schwinn, some courts have circumvented its broad proscriptions, even for the more onerous restraints of trade.

1. The requirement of "firm and resolute" enforcement

The Schwinn Court found that the manufacturer enforced its territorial and customer restrictions with threats that the franchise would be terminated. As a result, some courts have interpreted Schwinn to mean that enforcement of the restraints by the manufacturer is necessary to a finding of a per se illegality. Such decisions are both logical and consistent with the purposes of section 1 of the Sherman Act.

In Janel Sales Corp. v. Lanvin Parfums, Inc., the Second Circuit held that a customer restriction was not a per se violation since there was conflicting evidence as to whether the manufacturer had been "firm and resolute" in insisting on compliance with the restric-

86. It is interesting to note that the first cases to use this reasoning involved absolute customer restraints, as in Schwinn. See notes 89-90, 97 infra and accompanying text. However, subsequent application of the rationale of these decisions has encompassed many of the less burdensome restraints of trade. See notes 92, 101-102 infra and accompanying text.

87. The Court stated:

It is clear and entirely consistent with the District Court's findings that Schwinn has been "firm and resolute" in insisting upon observance of territorial and customer limitations by its bicycle distributors and upon confining sales by franchised retailers to consumers, and that Schwinn's "firmness" in these reports was grounded upon the communicated danger of termination.

tion.\textsuperscript{92} Similarly, in \textit{Colorado Pump & Supply Co. v. Febco, Inc.},\textsuperscript{93} a manufacturer authorized a distributor to sell within a defined area. In concluding that there was no per se violation, the Tenth Circuit pointed out that there was no “firm and resolute” insistence upon the observance of the restriction.\textsuperscript{94}

2. \textit{Dangerous products—“without more”}

The \textit{Schwinn} court stated:\textsuperscript{95}

Under the Sherman Act, it is unreasonable without more for a manufacturer to seek to restrict and confine areas or persons with whom an article may be traded after the manufacturer has parted with dominion over it.

In \textit{Tripoli Co. v. Wella Corp.},\textsuperscript{96} a manufacturer prohibited the resale of beauty and barber supplies to nonprofessional users. The Third Circuit reached for the “without more” language of \textit{Schwinn}, found that “there [was] more”\textsuperscript{97} due to the potential danger of the product to uneducated consumers,\textsuperscript{98} and held that the restriction was to be treated under the rule of reason.\textsuperscript{99} In a similar case, the Court of Claims citing \textit{Tripoli} held that the rule of reason must be applied to vertical restraints on the resale of drugs.\textsuperscript{100} At least one state court has extended this concept and judged vertical restraints, used to maintain quality control, under the rule of reason.\textsuperscript{101} applicable to the Schwinn facts, proof that a company is new or failing is relevant to a showing that a vertical restraint is not anti-competitive and is accordingly sheltered by the rule of reason.\textsuperscript{103}

In Sylvania, the manufacturer sought a failing company instruction, arguing that it would be forced to abandon its business if it were not allowed to increase its share of the market through the imposition of the dealer-location clauses.\textsuperscript{104} The court noted the existence of the failing company defense,\textsuperscript{105} but concluded there was no need for a jury instruction incorporating the defense, because a new trial had been ordered under the rule of reason.\textsuperscript{106} By looking to the procompetitive effect of the location clause,\textsuperscript{107} however, the majority silently adopted the reasoning of the failing company exception.\textsuperscript{108} Thus, even though Sylvania's actions led to a restraint of trade, the court permitted them in order to avoid the loss of a competitor. Therefore, the court preserved competition in the industry.\textsuperscript{109}

IV. Interpreting the Per Se Rule

Controversy abounds as to the application of the per se rule. While some jurists attempt to avoid the effects of such a rule,\textsuperscript{110} others strictly construe Schwinn to mean that all post-sale vertical restraints are prohibited. Judge Kilkenny, in his Sylvania dissent, argued that United States v. Topco Associates, Inc., a case involving horizontal restraints, "strengthened and extended the Schwinn per se rule against territorial restrictions." He took issue with the procompetitive policy argument of the Sylvania majority and stated:

\textsuperscript{109} It should be noted that this argument parallels similar concerns expressed under section 7 of the Clayton Act. Thus, the primary goal of the Clayton Act is the preservation of competition and not necessarily competitors. Accordingly, although a merger leads to one less competitor, it would be prevented only if it tended to lessen competition. Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320 (1962). Note however, in cases like Sylvania the continued existence of the competitor necessarily insures the preservation of competition due to the oligopolistic nature of the industry.

... [T]opco stands for the rule that restricted intrabrand competition cannot be justified by alleged interbrand competitive gain... [and that] the preservation and encouragement of intrabrand competition, [is] a desirable end in itself.

Topco was an association of supermarkets engaged in procuring and distributing food items under brand names owned by Topco, in order to compete more effectively with larger national and regional chains. Each member agreed with Topco to the designation of a territory in which that member could sell Topco brand products. Although striking down the territorial restrictions, the Court emphasized that a per se violation existed because the restraint was essentially horizontal and not vertical. Horizontal restraints have traditionally been per se violations and thus the case is easily distinguished from both Schwinn and Sylvania.

In his Sylvania dissent, Judge Kilkenny also stated that Cooper Liquors, Inc. v. Adolph Coors Co., "... reaffirms the Schwinn dogma that the Supreme Court has 'set its face against both horizontal and vertical territorial restrictions'..." However, the Fifth Circuit found that Coors' system of exclusive regional distributorships had the effect of maintaining control over the wholesale and retail prices of its beer. Price fixing is another traditional per se violation. Therefore, any restraint accompanied by price fixing is illegal regardless of its reasonableness. Accordingly, Coors is factually and legally distinguishable from both Schwinn and Sylvania.

V. Conclusion

The creation and application of an absolute per se rule with regard to all post-sale vertical restraints is not justified. Instead, restraints affecting trade require the weighing of the procompetitive and anticompetitive effects of the restraint, in order to determine what result is best for a particular industry and for society as a whole.

Enlightened decisions\textsuperscript{124} dealing with less offensive restraints of trade, and decisions\textsuperscript{125} which look to the specific language of Schwinn to reach a contrary result are part of a trend to abandon the per se rule for a more result-oriented approach. These cases indicate an awareness of the "economic and business stuff"\textsuperscript{126} which governs the business world. Such an analysis benefits the business giants, the single proprietorships, and ultimately the consumers.\textsuperscript{127} Thus, the Supreme Court should reexamine the Schwinn per se rule and end its broad proscriptions.
