Understanding the Exceptional and Dynamic Nature of Boumediene Rights to Court Access

Andrew Kent

Follow this and additional works at: https://ir.lawnet.fordham.edu/faculty_scholarship
Part of the Courts Commons, and the National Security Law Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://ir.lawnet.fordham.edu/faculty_scholarship/498
RESPONSE

UNDERSTANDING THE EXCEPTIONAL AND DYNAMIC NATURE OF BOUMEDIENE RIGHTS TO COURT ACCESS

ANDREW KENT†

I appreciate Professor Steve Vladeck’s engagement with my Essay about the future of habeas litigation for Guantanamo detainees. My Essay questions the Obama Administration’s recent statement that Boumediene v. Bush granted a constitutional right to habeas corpus that continues in perpetuity, allowing detainees to continue filing successive habeas petitions for as long as they are detained. I argue that the question of continuing access to the courts for Guantanamo detainees who have lost their habeas cases is significantly more complicated than the Obama Administration conveyed.

My argument has two parts. First, I propose that the court-access rights granted by Boumediene could be held to have expired once a federal habeas court found a detainee to be an enemy fighter (a “judicially-confirmed

† Associate Professor, Fordham Law School; Faculty Advisor, Center on National Security at Fordham Law School.

2 553 U.S. 723, 732-33 (2008) (holding that “[aliens held at Guantanamo] do have the habeas corpus privilege” and that the procedures provided by the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 do not provide an adequate substitute).

3 See Kent, supra note 1, at 20-21 (discussing the Justice Department’s recent announcement that it would not contest such petitions).
enemy fighter”). In other words, Boumediene might be read to give the detainees only one bite at the habeas apple. Second, I contend that federal courts have a duty to inquire sua sponte whether Boumediene-based rights to court access still exists for judicially-confirmed enemy fighters because, in addition to involving individual rights and other considerations, court access under Boumediene implicates the federal courts’ subject matter jurisdiction. As a result, the executive branch may not waive this potential jurisdictional deficiency, and therefore, the Obama Administration’s concession is inoperative. I conclude, however, that there are some arguments supporting continued court access for judicially-confirmed enemy fighters at Guantanamo, including important policy considerations.

Like the Department of Justice in its recent filing, Professor Vladeck contends that if Boumediene was rightly decided, habeas corpus rights must continue in perpetuity for all Guantanamo detainees, including judicially-confirmed enemy fighters. However, given the law prior to Boumediene and the precise holdings of the Boumediene Court, I think Professor Vladeck’s theory misses several key issues. In particular, the rights the Boumediene Court granted were both exceptional—that is, an exception from previous law and practice, which had denied such rights—and dynamic—meaning that the result of Boumediene’s test for whether to grant a given detainee these rights is changeable over time as the circumstances evaluated by the test change.

Historically, the right to access U.S. courts and to claim protection under U.S. law, including the Constitution, was limited by citizenship, territorial location, and enemy status. Enemy aliens (citizens or subjects of a nation at war with the United States), were barred from accessing U.S. courts during wartime unless they were resident in America and had refrained from taking hostile actions against the United States. And all aliens who were outside the United States lacked any rights under the U.S. Constitution. Even if present in the United States (say, as prisoners of... war), enemy fighters lacked any right to access U.S. courts and any individual rights under the Constitution. As Justice Kennedy, the author of Boumediene, once put it, “[T]he Constitution does not create, nor do general principles of law create, any juridical relation between our country and some undefined, limitless class of noncitizens who are beyond our territory.” There were always sharp limits to the scope of our constitutional community, and for noncitizens, access to U.S. courts and to U.S. constitutional rights historically depended on being a civilian (not an enemy fighter) who was present in the United States.

These rules came under challenge starting about the middle of the twentieth century. And Boumediene was a watershed moment. As the Boumediene Court noted, “before today the Court has never held that noncitizens detained by our Government in territory over which another country maintains de jure sovereignty have any rights under our Constitution.” The Boumediene Court did not reject the relevance of citizenship, territorial location, or enemy status in determining rights to court access or to individual constitutional rights. But the Court did reject the old, categorical, bright-line rules based on these factors. In its place, the Court substituted a multi-factor, nonexclusive test to determine whether a noncitizen outside the United States had a constitutional right to access U.S. courts via habeas corpus:

[We] conclude that at least three factors are relevant in determining the reach of the Suspension Clause: (1) the citizenship and status of the detainee and the adequacy of the process through which that status determination was made; (2) the nature of the sites where apprehension and then detention

See, e.g., Eisentrager v. Forrestal, 174 F.2d 961, 963-65 & 963 n.9 (D.C. Cir. 1949) (holding that the Fifth Amendment Due Process and Habeas Suspension Clauses protect “any person,” anywhere in the world, including admitted agents of the German government convicted of war crimes by a U.S. military commission in China and detained in U.S.-occupied Germany), rev’d sub nom. Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 785 (1950) (holding that the German petitioners lacked constitutional rights, including the right to access U.S. courts).

Some scholars contend that Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1937), established that noncitizens abroad have judicially enforceable constitutional rights, see, e.g., Louis Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the U.S. Constitution 305-06 (2d ed. 1996), but as I have previously pointed out, this greatly over-reads a decision which expressly confined its discussion to the rights of U.S. citizens, see Kent, Global Constitution, supra note 11, at 474-75.

2012] Exceptional and Dynamic Nature of Boumediene Rights took place; and (3) the practical obstacles inherent in resolving the prisoner’s entitlement to the writ.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 766.}

When the detainees went to the Supreme Court in 2007 requesting a constitutional right to habeas corpus, they claimed to be innocent civilians who had been designated enemy fighters only through a flawed, administrative review procedure.\footnote{\textit{Id.}} Thus, as framed by the Court’s test, the detainees’ claim was that, even though they were noncitizens outside the sovereign territory of the United States, the “status” and “process” factors favored granting them a constitutional right to habeas.\footnote{\textit{Id.}} The \textit{Boumediene} Court agreed, holding that they had a constitutional right to have a federal habeas court evaluate their status using adequate procedures.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 766-67.} My Essay’s contention is that, after federal habeas courts found the detainees to be enemy fighters—after they had their day in court and lost—\textit{Boumediene} may no longer provide them with any continuing right to court access because the “status” and “process” factors now cut against them instead of in their favor.\footnote{\textit{Kent, supra} note 1, at 31.} They are now noncitizens outside the United States and judicially-confirmed enemy fighters who cannot point to much in the way of special factors supporting their continued entitlement to court access.\footnote{\textit{The detainees can still argue that the place of their detention is far from any theater of combat and, while not sovereign U.S. territory, is under the uncontested jurisdiction and control of the United States. See} \textit{Boumediene}, 553 U.S. at 755, 768 & 770 (emphasizing these points).\textit{Vladeck, supra} note 8, at 79-80.\textit{Id.} at 79.\textit{Id.} at 81.}

Professor Vladeck disagrees with this for several reasons. He claims that \textit{Boumediene} is not a case about individual rights at all, but rather one that announced a structural, separation of powers–based rule.\footnote{\textit{Id.}} He also contends that “if \textit{Boumediene} was rightly decided, it must necessarily follow that the federal courts have jurisdiction not only to entertain habeas petitions, but also to protect that jurisdiction by policing the ability of detainees to file future petitions.”\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 79.\textit{Id.} at 81.} In other words, Professor Vladeck appears to read \textit{Boumediene} as announcing an unalterable, impersonal, structural requirement that, so long as the Executive holds detainees at Guantanamo Bay, those detainees have an inextinguishable right to petition federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus.
There are several aspects of Professor Vladeck’s analysis with which I disagree. First, the ability of a given person to access U.S. civilian courts is a question of a particular individual’s rights, and U.S. courts have always treated it as such.\textsuperscript{25} More than once in \textit{Boumediene}, the Court referred to detainees’ ability to access U.S. courts via habeas corpus as a “right” or a “privilege.”\textsuperscript{26} Once properly in court, individuals can typically raise all sorts of claims. Thus, Professor Vladeck is correct that in habeas cases, detainees may simply claim that the government lacks legal authority to detain instead of raising a claim that an individual constitutional right, like Due Process or Equal Protection, has been violated.\textsuperscript{27} But it is not faithful to either \textit{Boumediene} or a great deal of earlier precedent to suggest, as Professor Vladeck appears to, that courts do not evaluate a given individual’s right to court access but look only at nonindividuated questions of constitutional structure.\textsuperscript{28} Indeed, it is hard to understand \textit{Boumediene}’s test for “determining the reach of the Suspension Clause”\textsuperscript{29} as doing anything other than looking at the specific legal status and factual circumstances of a given detainee and deciding if that particular person has a constitutional right to habeas corpus. As quoted above, the individual factors \textit{Boumediene} highlights include citizenship, territorial location, enemy status, the process through which that individual status determination was made, and the like.\textsuperscript{30} The Court \textsuperscript{25} Though earlier courts used different language than they would today, U.S. courts have consistently said, in both habeas and nonhabeas cases, that the inquiry turned on the particular individual’s entitlement to court access. See Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763, 777-78 (1950) (noting that “the privilege of litigation has been extended to aliens, whether friendly or enemy, only because permitting their presence in the country implied protection”); Mrs. Alexander’s Cotton, 69 U.S. (2 Wall.) 404, 421 (1864) (“Mrs. Alexander, being now a resident in enemy territory, and in law an enemy, can have no standing in any court of the United States so long as that relation shall exist.”); Norris v. Doniphan, 61 Ky. (4 Met.) 385, 402 (1863) (applying “those principles of the common law, which suspend an alien enemy’s right of action during war”); Dorsey v. Kyle, 30 Md. 512, 519 (1869) (explaining that “[a]s a general rule, an alien enemy is not allowed to maintain suit in the Courts of the country with which he is, at the time, in hostility”).

\textsuperscript{26} \textit{Boumediene v. Bush}, 553 U.S. 723, 798 (2008) (referring to constitutionally protected habeas corpus as “a right of first importance”; see also id. at 739 (“[P]rotection for the privilege of habeas corpus was one of the few safeguards of liberty specified in a Constitution that, at the outset, had no Bill of Rights.”); id. at 743 (equating the “privilege” of habeas corpus protected by the Suspension Clause with a constitutional “right”); id. at 768 (considering habeas corpus to be a “right[ ]” protected by the Suspension Clause); id. at 770 (“It is true that before today the Court has never held that noncitizens detained by our Government in territory over which another country maintains \textit{de jure} sovereignty have any rights under our Constitution.”).

\textsuperscript{27} See Vladeck, supra note 8, at 80-81.

\textsuperscript{28} See id.

\textsuperscript{29} See, e.g., \textit{Boumediene}, 553 U.S. at 766.

\textsuperscript{30} See supra text accompanying note 16.
considered its decision to be a determination of individual constitutional rights, and there is no reason to challenge this assessment.

Second, I disagree with Professor Vladeck’s views that this Boumediene test for court access is static and that the right of court access conferred by Boumediene is ongoing and irrevocable. This is not, in my opinion, the best reading of the decision.

As noted, the right conferred by Boumediene is exceptional. The Guantanamo detainees were noncitizens outside the United States who, under pre-Boumediene law, lacked individual constitutional rights, including the right to habeas. Applying the multi-factor test, the Boumediene Court carved out an exception based on the specific facts of the Guantanamo detainees’ situation in 2008. If the facts justifying the exception change, the exception might no longer be available to detainees.

And the multi-factor test outlined in Boumediene is dynamic, meaning that changing circumstances will lead to different results under the test. Even for a person who remains in the same geographic spot on the globe, every one of the Boumediene factors can change over time.

- “Citizenship”: Individuals can gain or lose citizenship based on both the government’s actions and their own.
- “[T]he nature of the sites where apprehension and then detention took place”: Even if the detainee stays in the same place, the nature of the place can change around him. Leased territory, such as Guantanamo, can be fully incorporated into the sovereign territory of the nation holding the lease, or the lease can be terminated and the territory can revert to the full control and sovereignty of its original owner. Within a war zone, territory can be gained or lost by contending armies—what was the frontlines can become the rear and vice versa.

Further, over the course of a long war, many other legal and practical changes can take place. For example, starting in late 2001 with the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, the United States was a hostile military occupier of an enemy state. Once a friendly Afghan government was installed, the U.S. presence had the consent of the host state and since then has operated as a co-belligerent assisting the Afghan government in its civil war against Kabul.

---

31 See supra note 26 and accompanying text.
32 To be sure, the Court seemed to understand in Boumediene that it was determining in bulk that all detainees had a right to access the courts via habeas. But that was because all detainees were identically situated in relevant respects: noncitizens, but not enemy aliens, detained at Guantanamo, and determined by the same administrative procedures to be enemy combatants.
33 See Vladeck, supra note 8, at 81 & 85.
34 See supra notes 10-12 and accompanying text.
al Qaeda and the Taliban. By 2014, only a small U.S. civil and military presence will remain. For the thousands of enemy fighters detained by the United States in Afghanistan, “the nature of the site” where they were apprehended and have been detained has been changing drastically over the years.

- “[P]ractical obstacles inherent in resolving the prisoner’s entitlement to the writ”: The Boumediene Court’s analysis suggests that this factor overlaps somewhat with the inquiry about the “nature” of the sites of apprehension and detention, and involves looking at the military situation on the ground where the detainee is held, the potential cost and intrusiveness of judicial review into the war-fighting mission, relations between the United States and the foreign host government, and similar practicalities. Therefore, as these factors change, the exceptional right to habeas corpus for a noncitizen detained outside the United States could also change. And because the other Boumediene factors are dynamic in this sense, it should not be a surprise that the one factor I primarily focus on in my Essay is also dynamic. Returning to the first of the factors in Boumediene’s test:

- “[S]tatus of the detainee and the adequacy of the process through which that status determination was made”: “Status” in the Guantanamo context is a shorthand way of referring to questions about either the detainee’s relationship to enemy military organizations or other individual conduct which would make the person detainable. Status can presumably change based on the detainee’s renouncing or adopting different affiliations with enemy military organizations. Status can also change by means of the government’s status-determining processes. This is the key change that has occurred since Boumediene was decided and the primary reason why I suggest that the Boumediene rights of those detainees that have undergone such status determination might have expired. Now that federal habeas courts have found the detainees to be enemy fighters, their “status” and “the process through which that status determination was made” have changed dramatically.

Applying the very test that Boumediene established to detainees’ changed circumstances today suggests that the constitutional right to court access announced in Boumediene may well have expired for judicially-confirmed enemy fighters. The citizenship factors have always cut against these detainees, as does their apprehension and detention outside the sovereign territory of the United States. Now both the status and process factors also work against them because they have been confirmed enemy fighters by the federal courts’ habeas processes.

---

38 See Kent, supra note 1, at 31.

I do not want to appear to overstate my points. My Essay identifies possible counter-arguments to my legal analysis, and Professor Vladeck’s response raises others. Further, I close my Essay noting various policy reasons that might support continued court access for judicially-confirmed enemy fighters at Guantanamo. Still, federal courts cannot avoid confronting the question of whether Boumediene rights have expired for judicially-confirmed enemy fighters because such expiration would strip the courts of subject matter jurisdiction. And there are solid reasons to think that the answer to that question should be yes, Boumediene rights do expire. Our Constitution and courts might properly be solicitous of individuals claiming to be innocent civilians wrongly detained by the U.S. military through flawed procedures. It is harder—not impossible, but harder—to see why that solicitude should continue when the individuals have been determined by independent, Article III judges to be members of terrorist groups engaged in an armed conflict with the United States.

39 See id. at 37–38.